DEAR MR. LEVER: Referring to our conversation over the telephone regarding the authority of the Secretary as set forth in the Hatch Act and in the Adams Act, I beg to say that in the original Hatch Act the Commissioner, now Secretary, of Agriculture had no authority whatever in the matter of controlling the operations or funds appropriated under the Hatch Act. Secretary Morton, recognizing the weakness of the act, had section 3, which you read to me over the telephone, incorporated. This merely gives the Secretary authority to, so far as practicable, secure uniformity of methods and results of the work of said stations and to furnish, so far as practicable, forms for the tabulation of results of investigations or experiments, to indicate from time to time such lines of inquiry as to him shall seem most important, etc. There is nothing in the act anywhere that gives the Secretary authority to administer the act as an act.

The Adams Act, on the other hand, gives the Secretary express authority to administer the entire act, as you will find at the end of section 4, reading as follows:

"If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby charged with the proper administration of this law."

That is, the Secretary of Agriculture, as you will see, is charged with the entire administration of the law, and as a result of this, I am informed by the Office of Experiment Stations that it is practicable for them to much more rigidly control the work inaugurated than is the case under the Hatch Act.

I think your bill carries this clause in it; and if so, it is my opinion—and Dr. True concurs with me in this—that nothing further is needed to give the Secretary sufficient authority to keep definite control of all operations under your bill.

Very sincerely,

B. T. GALLOWAY,
Chief of Bureau.

It gives him authority only to see that the funds that we are appropriating shall go to the purposes for which they were appropriated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have three minutes more.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit to the membership of this House, and particularly to the gentleman from South Carolina, that if this language were stricken out the Secretary of Agriculture would have all of the authority that is anywhere given him by the law; but if it is left in I fear he may have authority, or some Secretary of Agriculture might at least claim it, to supervise the duties and make rules and regulations that the law itself explicitly gives to some one else. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to page 2, section 3, of the printed bill—

That all printed matter and correspondence for the furtherance of the purpose of this act issued from the agricultural colleges, etc., shall be transmitted in the mails of the United States * * * free of charge of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General from time to time may prescribe.

There is a duty devolving upon the Postmaster General, and we ought not to give to the Secretary of Agriculture any hint in this law that he should have any authority to control the action of the Postmaster General. There are other places in the bill where the Secretary of the Treasury is specifically authorized and instructed to perform certain duties and acts. We ought not to put anything in the bill that might throw a cloud upon his authority or his right to carry out according to the law as laid down in the act prescribing his duties. I would like to have the gentleman say, if this language is stricken out, what particular place in the bill, if any, would there be any lack of authority on the part of anybody to perform the duties prescribed by the act. But if you leave it in, there may be a dispute between different officials as to who shall have authority, and therefore bring about confusion.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, could not the gentleman get his object by restricting the language a little?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it could be done. I thought at first that I would offer the amendment to strike out the word "law" and insert "section." I thought in reading it that the author of the act intended this particular clause to apply to this particular section, and if it did only apply to this section I would have no objection to it. It could not bring any harm because this section provides duties for the Secretary of Agriculture, but when I saw that the word "law" was used I could clearly see that much uncertainty and perhaps friction might ensue in the enforcement of the law.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, this language is identical with the language in the Adams Act, as contained in section 4.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Adams Act contain other provisions like this act, defining the duties of these other officials?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I think so; free mailing and all those things, and I was about to say that since the enactment of the Adams Act the relationship between the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural colleges and experiment stations has become closer and closer, and they have found a line of demarcation between their duties that is perfectly understood by each of them. There is another point I would like to suggest, and it is this: We are appropriating from the Federal Treasury $3,000,000 here to the various States of the Union—$3,480,000 annually at the end of 10 years from now—for the purpose of doing certain things, and while I am a State-rights Democrat, I am willing to and I believe Congress ought to reserve to itself the right to see to it that the funds appropriated by it to the various States should be used for the purposes for which they were appropriated. If we give this money outright to the States, with no control upon it at all by the Department of Agriculture or by Congress, the agricultural colleges might—I do not think they would, but they might—use it for purposes entirely beyond and without the pale of the provisions of this bill. Instead of using 75 per cent of these appropriations for the purpose of doing field demonstration, they might use 75 per cent of it for the purpose of teaching home economics, and somebody somewhere ought to have authority to see to it that the funds are being used in a general way for the general purposes for which they were appropriated.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it specifically provided for in this bill?

Mr. LEVER. I think not. I think this is the only language in this bill which gives the Secretary of Agriculture any authority whatever or anybody else to see to it that the colleges do with the money which is appropriated for them what it is intended that they should do under the law.

Mr. NORRIS. What particular section does the gentleman think this applies to?

Mr. SMALL. To section 1, which provides specifically that this work shall be done under the immediate direction of the college or colleges in each State which shall receive the benefits of this act. That is in section 1. Now, it is also provided that this work shall be done by the several colleges in the several States.

Mr. LEVER. I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That Congress may at any time annul, suspend, or repeal any or all of the provisions of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. The usual language is "may at any time amend, alter, or repeal." I suppose this covers it, but when we have a form it is desirable to follow it.

Mr. LEVER. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois this language is copied from the Adams Act.

Mr. MANN. Because it was written by some outside party.

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the words "annul, suspend" and insert "alter, amend" in place thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "annul, suspend" and insert in lieu thereof the words "alter, amend."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, just one moment. There are a number of gentlemen who have spoken on this bill who request unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The Journal clerk informs the Chair that leave was given yesterday.

EVAN URNER RINEHART.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 7267 and that it be considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from the further consideration of Senate bill 7267. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. SISSON. I would like to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Whether the Speaker recognized the gentleman for that purpose? This bill is not on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman said it was, and that is all the Chair knows about it.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman's motion is incorrect, because his motion was to discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Senate bill is identical with the bill I introduced. If my bill passes it would have to go back to the Senate, and that is the reason I asked leave to call up this bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois will agree that this bill ought to have been on the Private Calendar all the time.

Mr. MANN. But it has not been reported yet. Let the gentleman ask unanimous consent to call up the House bill.

If that is granted, then he can ask unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 25428 and to discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from its further consideration, and that it be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to call up House bill 25428 and to discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from its further consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will suggest to the gentleman he ask unanimous consent to consider the House bill, and if he gets it I have no doubt the House will give him unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 25428, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25428) waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Evan Urner Rinehart.

Be it enacted, etc., That the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy be, and it is hereby, waived for one year in the case of Evan Urner Rinehart, in consideration of his previous naval service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will ask the gentleman to withhold his objection. I would like to make a few remarks.

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the objection so far as that is concerned and reserve it on anything else until 6.30 p. m., when, I understand, we are likely to take a recess.

Mr. BUTLER. Then why not take it now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. MANN. I said I would reserve the objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask the gentleman to reserve his objection, so that I may explain the bill. I think possibly he will not object after he is acquainted with its merits. This is a young man who entered the Naval Academy, graduated therefrom, and after graduation served two years and three months of sea duty. Upon examination his hearing was found to be slightly defective, and he was therefore asked to resign from the Navy. He is just three months over the limit of entering the Pay Corps, which is the age of 26 years, and he asks that this limit be waived in his case in order that he may take the examination for that corps. The reason he desires to enter the Pay Corps is that the requirements as to hearing there are not as strict as the regulations under which he has been serving. In sea duty one is compelled to have an acute hearing in case of fogs, or anything of the kind, but in the Pay Corps conditions do not require such keenness. As I have stated, Rinehart was educated for the Navy at the expense of the Government. He is thoroughly equipped to enter the Pay Corps, and by reason of his naval experience and training would prove a valuable member of that department.

In case of actual battle he would not only be a good man in the Pay Corps Department, but if his services were needed in any other capacity on the vessel he would be able to discharge the duty assigned him. I think, in view of these facts, and in view of the fact that the young man comes from one of our very best families and has devoted his time and energies to the Navy, there should be no objection to waiving the age limit so that he may take the examination. He does not ask any rights that anybody else would not have, but he desires to have the requirement waived so that he may take the examination necessary to be taken to enter the Pay Corps. The Navy would be getting the services of a good man, and the Navy Department has no objection to the passage of this bill. Young Rinehart comes from a long line of splendid men of our State. He is a nephew of Rinehart the sculptor, the man who completed the bronze doors in front of this Capitol when, after the death of Crawford, he was asked to finish the work. It was this same sculptor, Rinehart, who designed those statues on the side of the clock there [indicating]. This young Rinehart is a splendid young man and comes from a splendid family. He has done good work in the Navy, and I ask that the gentlemen do not object to the age limit being waived. I want him to be given another chance. As I say, he is only three months above the required age.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the gentleman's statement that this young man comes from a good family, and that his service has been satisfactory, is correct. His abilities ought to enable him to secure employment elsewhere, and Congress should not be asked to set aside the regulations in his behalf. I do not regard these matters as personal affairs, either in cases of promotion or assignments to the retired list, or anything of that kind. I object to all of them, and I shall object to this one.

FRANK D. COURTRADE.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 23604) for the relief of Frank D. Courtrade.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] asks unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 23604, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the disqualification to make homestead entry found by the Department of the Interior to exist by reason of the ownership by Frank D. Courtrade of thirty one-hundredths of an acre of land in excess of 160 acres, at the time, to wit, July 2, 1910, that he made settlement upon, and on August 1, 1910, when he applied to make homestead entry of the south half of north half of section 18, township 37 south, range 7 east, Willamette meridian, Oregon, be, and the same hereby is, removed; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to allow homestead entry by said Courtrade under his application to enter said land, filed August 1, 1910, and known as No. 03882, series of the United States land office at Lakeview, Oreg., as of the date applied for; but nothing herein contained shall be construed as waiving full compliance with the homestead laws in the matter of residence and improvement under such entry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] whether this party owns more than 160 acres now?

Mr. HAWLEY. No. He sold the 160 acres he had and put the improvements on the land he is now living on, and the department in its report makes a strong statement in his favor.

Mr. SISSON. How much land will he have after he gets this? Will he have more than the law permits?

Mr. HAWLEY. He gets just 160 acres that the law permits him to enter. He has three small town lots that were not supposed to count against him when he made the filing on this land.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by striking out the name "Courtrade" and inserting in lieu thereof the name "Courtade."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 1, lines 5 and 6, by striking out the words "thirty one-hundredths" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "thirty-one sixty-fourths."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 3, by striking out the name "Courtrade" and inserting in lieu thereof the name "Courtade."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Frank C. Courtade."

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until half past 8 o'clock to-night.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) a recess was taken until 8 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, at 8 o'clock and 30 minutes the House was called to order by the Speaker.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] has been ill for some weeks. Before he became ill he prepared a very fine speech on this agricultural extension bill, and at the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and myself, he is desirous that the same be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask leave that that be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] asks leave to have printed in the RECORD a speech by Representative HUGHES of Georgia, who is now sick. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The remarks are as follows:

"Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been ably presented by the author, Mr. LEVER, of South Carolina. Ten thousand dollars is appropriated annually to each State which shall assent to the provisions of the act. This appropriaton is unconditional to the several States. Three hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for the fiscal year of 1914, and an annual increase of this appropriation of $300,000 a year over the preceding year for a period of nine years is provided until the total amount of the additional appropriations will be the sum of $3,000,000, which is to be allotted to the several States in the proportion which their rural population bears to the total rural population of the United States.

CONDITIONS.

"Before any State can avail itself of its pro rata share of this appropriation the said State must supplement an equal amount to its pro rata share. The amounts appropriated to each State by this bill are under the direction of the land-grant colleges, the agricultural colleges of the several States. Not less than 75 per cent of all moneys available under this act shall be expended each year for field instruction and demonstration. The remainder is available for home economics and allied subjects—

"When a Federal grant is made conditioned on State aid, the State support comes and a great system of education follows.

"This appropriation, in the last analysis, will be an investment the result of which will reach, in proportions, the National and State Treasuries and every artery of trade, business, and enterprise in this land.

"This bill as amended was unanimously recommended by the Committee on Agriculture.

WHY I SUPPORT THIS BILL.

"In supporting this bill I do so as a practical farmer, having been actively engaged in this occupation for 40 years.

"Four years of this time I was president of the Georgia State Agricultural Society, the duties of which office carried me into almost every county of my State. During these visits I carefully studied farm conditions both in the field and in the home. My conclusions were that education, education that could be applied, was the important question. I found unrest on the part of the young man, who was dissatisfied with his surroundings, believing that the tiller of the soil was not getting just compensation for his labor. I found that the adult farmer had accepted the aphorism that the farmer was 'a hewer of wood and a drawer of water'; that the mother was burdened with the monotony of household duties, committed to her confines, without restful diversion. She accepted the monotonous duties and seclusion with resigned fate. The daughter without social contact showed discontent. This I found to be the condition of ostracized farm life.

CONDITIONS IMPROVING.

"I am happy to say, however, that within the last few years conditions are being changed and farm life with them. Good roads are eliminating distance, putting neighbor in closer touch with neighbor and the country home in touch with the town home. Telephones are connecting many homes. Churches are more accessible and social relations are made possible. Good school buildings have been erected, with capable school-teachers, under direct control of competent county school commissioners, who are visited and directed by the State school commissioner. The rural free-delivery carriers daily disseminate various kinds of literature, magazines, daily papers, and bulletins. Such improved agricultural conditions have caused the farm home to become enlightened or more cheerful, giving more happiness and contentment. These improved conditions have brightened the hope and aspiration of the father and son. But the young man, ambitious and determined to better his financial condition, is still dissatisfied with the financial results of his farm life. Hence he is seeking employment in the city. A question of importance is, What must be done to keep the boy on the farm? I answer farm conditions must change in order to keep him there. He must be brought to the realization of the fact that he is engaged in a great business undertaking. For him to become content the farm must become remunerative, with increased intellectual interest. In my opinion the passage of this bill will consummate this end. I am in favor of education, and compulsory education if necessary, for it generates light. I favor academic, scientific, and industrial education.

GEORGIA'S EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

"Georgia is preeminent in her educational institutions, namely, the Georgia Normal and Industrial College for Girls, the Technological School, her State Agricultural College, for the establishment of which I rendered my best efforts and of which I have been a trustee since its organization. Her agricultural schools are situated or located in every congressional district, her system of common schools is in operation throughout the State, and the great University of Georgia, in the classic city of Athens, has sent forth men of mark in every calling of life, some of whom within this very Hall of "our fathers' house" have electrified the Nation with their logic, eloquence, and statesmanship.

"This advanced stand in education speaks well for Georgia, but, alas, with all these institutions the farmer in Georgia—like the farmers North, East, South, and West—has been unable to get and use that practical information which would raise the standard of his occupation to the position it deserves. This information, which has been obtained by scientific research, is locked up in the vaults of our agricultural colleges, dormant and rusty. This bill is the key which will unlock these vaults and take this valuable information to the farmer on the land and by demonstration put it into the various agricultural channels where it will render service.

DEMONSTRATION NEGLECTED.

"It may be asked why the various agricultural colleges of this Union have not inaugurated this great plan of demonstration and put it into effective operation. In the first place, I think they have neglected an important duty, relying too much on the graduates, who were expected to return to the farm and employ their scientific information; and, in the second place, they have not been sufficiently equipped financially to undertake and conclude so gigantic an undertaking. The agricultural trains, the farmers' institutes, and the various agricultural bulletins have disseminated much knowledge and information, but these have reached successfully only a very small percentage of the farmers of this country, and especially have they failed to comprehensively reach the great majority of the farmers who were most in need of practical information. This bill will reach and grasp this great majority—about 90 per cent—and will revolutionize the agricultural interest of this entire country.

DR. KNAPP'S GREAT WORK.

"In my opinion Dr. Knapp, late of the United States Department of Agriculture, who extended this demonstration in the South, has accomplished more, directly, for the farmer than all other agencies combined. He has carried pent-up, inert, scientific information through his demonstrations by his demonstrators to the man in the field. Wheresoever he has reached this man he has awakened his energies, his thoughts, his purposes, and that man is proceeding to-day with new life and brighter hopes. His land has been made to yield 100 per cent more and his profit has been correspondingly increased.

"This bill proposes to put the Knapp demonstration plan into active operation in every county throughout the broad limits of this Union on a larger and broader scale.

"Just here permit me to say that the name of the late Dr. Knapp is stamped indelibly upon the hearts of the farmers of this country, especially those of the South, and a monument should be erected to his memory, the handiwork of every State.

HOW DEMONSTRATION HELPS.

"Demonstration on the land proves the importance and value of scientific research. For the district which I represent I obtained from the United States Department of Agriculture, through Dr. Knapp, demonstrators, men who had qualified by reducing theory to practice, for 6 of the 15 counties of my district. They established in each county from 10 to 20 1-acre farms (and in one instance a farm of 100 acres) so distributed as far as possible to include the different classifications of soil. Each proprietor of these farms contracted with the United States Department of Agriculture to conduct these farms as directed by agents of the department as to preparation, fertilization, and cultivation. These farms were inspected weekly and a report made to the department after each inspection.

"At first it was difficult to get the farmers to cooperate with the Government, but those who did readily saw by comparison and results that science was not a myth. Demonstration alone could have convinced, and those who complied with the requirements of the Government to-day have adopted the Knapp system, not only on the one acre, but the entire farm. Under this bill that which was accomplished in these counties will be accomplished not only in all of the 15 counties which I represent, but in every county in every State of this Union.

THE CASE OF A LARGE LANDOWNER.

"Demonstration is effective and conclusive not only to the man behind the plow and with the hoe, but to the large farmer, with his agents and supervisors. I know a large landowner conducting several farms, who has two sons who have remained on the farm and are his partners. They have attempted to be progressive along agricultural lines. They are members of the State agricultural society, attend the farmers' institutes, subscribe to the best agricultural publications, and apply to the State agricultural college for scientific information. They declare they have obtained better results and more practical information by and through the Knapp demonstration work than from any other source, and now they are conducting their farms exclusively on scientific plans which have been demonstrated.

NECESSITY FOR DEMONSTRATION UNIVERSAL.

"Now, if demonstration is necessary for a class of farmers who are supposed to operate under progressive systems and advanced idea, how much more necessary is it to the large majority of farmers—at least 90 per cent—who have neither the time nor inclination for study, who could not if they would, and would not if they could, solve the abstruse problems as set forth by bulletins, lectures, and agricultural trains.

"Demonstration is necessary to every class of farmers. Experimentation is costly to our experiment stations in their efforts to hand results to the farmer in digested form, to save him the heavy cost of personal experiment, which is almost prohibitory to the individual farmer, all of whose time must be devoted to execution, in order to successfully manage, control, and work his land. The agricultural college is the dynamo and demonstration the motor. To realize full force and power they are inseparable. This bill unites them and the spark is flashed.

BOYS' CORN CLUBS.

"The boys' corn clubs of Georgia achieved remarkable results and planted a spirit of laudable ambition in the hearts of the young boys on the farm that is encouraging. Five hundred of these boys raised over 100 bushels of corn on 1 acre each last year, and 750 raised more than 80 bushels per acre. This result was surprising not only to the fathers of these young men, but to the entire State, remembering that the average yield of corn per acre for the last 10 years was about 12½ bushels per acre in Georgia.

COOPERATION BETWEEN STATE AND UNION.

"The Lever bill will cause such cooperation between State and Union, through the agricultural colleges, accelerating and intensifying agricultural education by the only method that can possibly reach the farmer. He will hear, but he must see to be convinced. Demonstration convinces and arouses latent action and inspires hope, and progress is the result.

THE BOLL WEEVIL.

"The cotton crop of the United States is a national crop which directly or indirectly enters into every business enterprise in this great country. Its condition from the planting of the seed until it is baled is heralded throughout this country and cabled to every foreign land, for it not only keeps intact the gold reserve of this Union, but it clothes 60 per cent of the people of the entire globe. It reaches every home, whether the mansion or the cot. This great national crop is to-day being attacked by the increasing and indestructible boll weevil, first on the frontier of Texas and gradually, but surely, marching toward all the Atlantic cotton States; and if permanent demonstration is not inaugurated and pushed with all possible force and power before and after the weevil reaches the Atlantic cotton States, millions of dollars will be lost to the producer and millions of dollars of the loss will accrue to the consumer. If this bill is passed this great destroyer will be met with the combined power of State and Nation and the loss from the ravages of the weevil will be reduced to a minimum.

THE PEACH INDUSTRY.

"The peach industry is an important summer crop to many States of the Union. It is a crop conducive to health and wealth. It is being attacked by various destructive insects and fungi growths. This has cost the producers of this country millions of dollars. Many States have in operation departments of entomology which, in connection with the United States Department of Agriculture, have carried their experiments to the peach orchard, consummating remarkable results.

PERMANENT DEMONSTRATION.

"The passage of this bill will inaugurate a system of continued demonstration which no State alone can or will do; but by this united effort of the various States this summer crop will be preserved as an asset to the national wealth.

"I could mention other important crops which suffer from disease and insects, the continued production of which at a profit to the producer depends upon scientific demonstration.

LANDS DETERIORATING IN FERTILITY.

"Due to absence of scientific cultivation and rotation, the fertility of the soil has greatly deteriorated, and we are now forced to use commercial fertilizers to supply chemical ingredients which are necessary to plant life and soil preservation. This condition is recognized by all farmers. They realize their land has become less productive and that the soil must be impregnated with artificial fertility, but those farmers whose circumstances have been such that they have had no opportunity for scientific study—a college course—do not know the fertilizer required to supply the deficiency in the different and varied soils.

"This expert knowledge which the farmers will be able to obtain under this bill through the demonstrators will be to them just what the prescription of a physician is to the patient and the advice of a lawyer to the layman who is confronted with a legal question. Mr. Speaker, the need of a physician by a patient who is suffering from a malignant disease, the need of a litigant who is hard pressed in the courts for a lawyer, is no more imperative than is the need of the farmer for scientific demonstration. Under this bill it is anticipated, and it will be demanded that a scientific man of practical experience, as a county commissioner of agriculture or a doctor of agriculture, be placed in every county to answer the calls of the farmer.

CONSERVATION OF THE SOIL.

"The soil of this country, in the last analysis, is the storehouse of all wealth. Every living soul is dependent upon it. The very best thought of this Nation should be directed to its conservation.

"We hear much of the conservation of our timber, our mineral lands, and our rivers and harbors. The soil is the mother of all, and by whom or when has a voice been raised and decisive, active stand taken to conserve and perpetuate the soil?

"In the hearings before the Agricultural Committee Dr. Soule, president of the Georgia State Agricultural College, said: 'We have a great problem in this country, the conservation of our soil. That industry and science have practically developed hand in hand, but agricultural science has altogether outrun the practice of farming. In other words, our colleges to-day and the Department of Agriculture of the United States are in possession of thousands of fundamental facts that would increase crop production in this country were they placed within the reach of the farmer in a way which he could understand and apply.' This bill enlarges and perfects the Knapp plan and will place within the reach of the farmer that which he can understand and apply.

"Demonstration deferred for whatever cause has been a mistake which should be corrected, and this bill will not only correct but inaugurate and put into execution, in no uncertain way, this great system of reaching every farmer.

THE NEGRO LABORER.

"On the large plantations in the South negroes are the principal laborers. The older negroes, the heads of families, are generally renters and tenants, the younger, as a rule, wage-workers. Negro labor annually is growing less effective on the farm. The tenants, and especially the renters, are not only absolutely indifferent as to the care of the land and preservation of the soil, but destructive, remaining on one plantation until they have denuded the soil, then moving on some other plantation to rent and cultivate lands that have been kept in fair condition under the strict surveillance of the proprietor under the wage system.

"The younger generation is congregating in cities as day laborers and on public work, where they have the opportunity which they seek of immediate investment in that which they do not need, and frequently to their detriment, injury, and ruin. It is the desire of the South to change and improve these conditions. It is to the interest of the landowner to improve and advance the negro laborer. Something must be done to prove to him that it is to his interest, as well as to that of the proprietor, to preserve the soil, thereby reaping better returns. They attend as a holiday "conclave" the presentations by the agricultural colleges from agricultural trains and farmers' institutes, called extension work, and receive not one atom of information which they will or can apply. There are in my State and in the South quite a number of negro landowners. We wish to make them better farmers and object lessons to the tenants and renters.

"The passage of this bill, in my opinion, will mean as much to the negro as to the landowner. It will go to him on the land and prove to him by demonstration that he can make and get better returns for his labor by the progressive methods inaugurated by Dr. Knapp and concluded by this bill. When you convince them of this, with the eternal vigilance of the proprietor as a daily teacher, they will be better renters, tenants, and owners and will be attracted back to the farm.

INDIVIDUAL OWNERSHIP OBTAINS.

"Our land is farmed by individuals, not corporations. It is farmed by many millions of small farmers, and these can only be reached by national aid. The passage of the Morrill Act created a system of agricultural colleges which was impossible for the States to accomplish acting separately. The Hatch Act passed in 1887; and when this act became operative, experimentation attracted national interest; and when this bill—the Lever bill—is enacted into law, it will carry into operation the very intent and purpose of this great system which these earlier enactments intended for the perpetuation of the soil, making better farmers and more prosperous country life.

DEMAND OUTGROWING SUPPLY.

"It is estimated that in the last 10 years there has been a 23 per cent increase in acreage, 35 per cent in production, and 60 per cent in consumption. If this ratio continues, this country will, in 10 or 15 years, be importers of food instead of exporters. Our cities are growing rapidly, the inhabitants of which are consumers of farm products.

"Every industry—manufacturing enterprises, railroads, banking and mercantile institutions—relies upon the farm for their daily food supply. These facts and conditions should attract the attention of every Member of this Congress to the national necessity of preserving and improving the soil, thereby giving increased production to the farmer. The discussion of this question—the preservation of the soil—has attracted wide interest throughout the Nation. The scientist in his laboratory, the agricultural colleges, the banker, the merchant, the railroad president, have spoken in its behalf. The farmers' union, the grange, representing millions of farmers, urge the passage of this measure. Whereas much has been done in behalf of agriculture, less than 1 per cent of all the appropriations has been devoted to this interest, of such vital importance; and should this bill pass, it will be a tax of only about three and a half cents per capita. It will not do for this great country to defer this matter. It has been delayed too long.

"From information just compiled by the Bureau of Statistics it is shown that in the case of corn, the most important of the great cereal crops, the total yield in 1911 was little more than 2,500,000,000 bushels, or slightly below the average for the past 10 years, and to produce this corn required a larger area than was ever planted for this crop. The average yield per acre throughout this country was 23.9 bushels—less than any year since 1901. The average yield of wheat in 1911 was 12.5 bushels per acre, or less than in any year since 1900, except in 1904, when this low level was reached. While the increases per acre of American crops have been slight for the last 25 years, the European countries, which have been tilled for centuries, have shown a much greater gain in productivity within the same period. Germany in 1884 was producing an average of 40.6 bushels per acre of wheat, rye, barley, oats, and potatoes. The United States the same year had an average of 20.6 bushels. Twenty-five years later, in 1909, the average yield of these same crops in Germany had advanced to 71.8 bushels per acre, while in the United States the average was 24.8 bushels. Experts who have studied the question agree that this remarkable improvement in European agriculture is due to the adoption of new methods of farming, such as this bill proposes.

"This great Union has resources so varied, and in her confines the soil and climate are so adapted to the production of all crops, that we have grown indifferent, thoughtless, and inert, seemingly believing that the soil is indestructible and that its fertility is eternal, but facts show that such is not the case. The soil is deteriorating rapidly for the want of intelligent care, and it would be criminal on the part of those with whom the very destiny of the people rests to continue to delay and finally realize that they have been aroused too late.

"The soil—the land—is an inheritance, handed down to man for humanity. It belongs to future generations, and, as it passes through our hands, we are as responsible as the man with the talents. Let us do our duty—pass this bill—and receive the plaudit, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servants.'"

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 21826. An act validating certain homestead entries;

H. R. 26005. An act to provide for the establishment of one life-saving station on the larger of the two Libby Islands, situated at the entrance to Machias Bay, Me.; one life-saving station at Half Moon Bay, south of Point Montara and near Montara Reef, California; one life-saving station at Mackinac Island, Mich.; and one life-saving station at or near Sea Gate, New York Harbor, N. The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the following title:

H. R. 21279. An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

H. R. 26005. TUCKER ACT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent, if it is required, to consider several resolutions, known as Tucker Act resolutions, reported by the Committee on War Claims, sending claims to the Court of Claims for action in the ordinary way. The resolutions are in the hands of the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. As soon as the Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] he will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee. It is understood that gentlemen are to be recognized in their order.

CORBETT TUNNEL.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, while I have a couple of small matters on the Private Calendar——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not take up more than one of them on this call until others get through.

Mr. RAKER. While those are personal matters in my district, I am going to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 134, which has unanimously passed the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table, relating to the Corbett Tunnel matter. The Senate is familiar with it and the House has discussed it thoroughly. I have seen the gentlemen who were opposed to it heretofore, and they are all agreed that they have now no objection to this resolution. I shall offer an amendment to the resolution so that it can get back to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. RAKER. The resolution is that a certain amount of money be paid out of the Treasury in connection with the Corbett Tunnel matter; that is, claims of people who have furnished labor and materials in connection with the work. That was considered in the discussion of the President's veto here last Friday. I do this in behalf of humanity, in order that the laborers may be paid.

The SPEAKER. Is this the resolution that the President vetoed?

Mr. RAKER. No, sir; it is not the same resolution. It has been revamped.

The SPEAKER. Where is that resolution now?

Mr. RAKER. It is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Has it ever been referred to a committee?

Mr. RAKER. No, sir. I am going to ask unanimous consent that it be taken up and considered without being referred to the committee, because it has been gone over by the committee heretofore and it has unanimously passed the Senate. The House considered it in connection with the President's veto and the Senate has unanimously passed it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 134. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the bill or resolution reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) appropriating money for the payment of certain claims on account of labor, supplies, materials, and cash furnished in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel.

Resolved, etc., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States the sum of $42,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of and to be paid to those persons who have and hold and who have presented, or may present, claims, remaining unpaid, on account of labor, supplies, materials, or cash furnished to the contractor or the subcontractor in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, as a part of the Shoshone irrigation project, in the State of Wyoming, under any contract or contracts let for that purpose by the Government of the United States; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to forthwith, and as soon as may be, investigate, hear evidence about, determine and declare the several amounts due and remaining unpaid, on account thereof, and to whom so due, and to certify the amounts due to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized to pay the several amounts so ascertained to the persons entitled to the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendments if unanimous consent is given:

Lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "Treasury of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof "any moneys in the reclamation fund in the Treasury."

In line 4, page 2, after the word "unpaid," insert the words "if any."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, as I understand, he proposes not to charge the money to the project on which it was spent but to go into the general fund?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. What can be the theory of constantly diverting the reclamation fund? We have diverted it for bridges and other things; why not let each proposition stand on its own merit? Why not let the fellows have the benefit of each project?

Mr. RAKER. Let me say that after the engineers of the Reclamation Service had made a thorough examination as to the probable cost of this tunnel they let the contract, and there were six or seven bidders. After the tunnel was completed it was found to cost $80,000 more than the contract price, but it came within a few hundred dollars of the amount bid by the highest bidders, showing that the work was worth that much. These people furnished the labor and the material, and it actually went into the project, and as a matter of fact I will say that 16.2 per cent of the work done by the contractors was $57,000 less than any other 16 per cent of the same work. The Reclamation Service must have a little experience. They are doing the best they can, but these poor people that mortgaged their homes to pay off the laborers' claims and the material in order to get their money will lose their homes if they do not get this. I believe the laborers and small merchants are to be paid.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he will have to interrupt the hearing on this bill, and recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, who has a conference report.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 21279, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report, and that the statement be read in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to have the statement read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it now in order to make a point of order on a conference report?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman is to make it at all, now is the time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the House conferees, in receding from their disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 60 and agreeing to the same with an amendment, exceeded their authority and incorporated matters in the amendment not in difference between the two Houses.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Has consent been given that the matter may be taken up?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that consent was given this morning.

Mr. LAFFERTY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. There was a unanimous-consent agreement yesterday afternoon that on the completion of the Lever agricultural bill the Chair should recognize Members to call up bills on the Private Calendar, and I would like to ask if, after the conference report on the post-office bill is disposed of, there will be any opportunity for Members to be further recognized?

The SPEAKER. As far as the Chair is concerned, there will, but anybody can move to adjourn. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take up this conference report and consider it, notwithstanding the rule in regard to printing. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be pending, and the Clerk will read.

The conference report is as follows:

"For inland transportation by railroad routes, $47,646,000: Provided, That a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of three members of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and three members of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to be designated by the respective chairmen, to make inquiry into the subject of postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for the transportation of mail and to report at the earliest practicable date, and for this purpose they are authorized, by subcommittee or otherwise, to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress, at such times and places as they may deem advisable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summons and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary; and to pay the necessary expenses of such inquiry there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee. weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Before such readjustment, however, a detailed account must be kept as to the amount of business handled by such star route or screen wagon contractors before and after this section becomes effective for such a period as to clearly demonstrate the amount of the increase and that such increase in the weight of the mails was due to the adoption of the parcel-post system.

"That the establishment of zones and postage rates of this section shall go into effect January 1, 1913.

"That this act shall not in any way affect the postage rate on seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants, as fixed by section 482 of the Postal Laws and Regulations.

JOHN A. MOON,
D. E. FINLEY,
JOHN W. WEEKS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] raises a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. MURDOCK. My point of order is that the conferees, in receding from their disagreement to Senate amendment No. 60, relating to the St. Louis bridge, and agreeing with an amendment, exceeded their authority and incorporated into the agreement matters not in disagreement between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please state the propositions of the House and the Senate and the conferees.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the Speaker will permit me, I should like to proceed first with a statement of the matter itself.

For the last 11 years out of the appropriation for the inland transportation of mail by railroad routes we have paid $50,000 every year for the carriage of the mails across a single bridge at St. Louis, Mo. We pay especially for the carriage of the mail on no other bridge in the United States; and, save at St. Louis, we pay at no union station in the United States—neither at Kansas City, Chicago, Toledo, nor Boston—anything for rooms inside the station or for the transfer of the mails.

This payment at St. Louis has continued for 11 years, now making over one-half million dollars. Repeated efforts have been made to reach it. A provision for that purpose has, I think, been frequently reported out of the committee, but has usually gone out of the bill on a point of order on the floor of the House; but this year the House adopted successfully an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill which eliminated this payment from current law, the amendment reaching only current law by reason of the limitations of the rules of the House.

The amendment went to the Senate and the Senate amended the House amendment by striking this payment out of the permanent law, as well as out of the current law, and doing away with it entirely. So the House was of one mind—that this payment should cease. The Senate was of the same mind—that the payment should cease. The only difference between the two Houses was the difference between current law and permanent law.

The conferees at their meeting yesterday or the day before, not responding to the wish either of the House or of the Senate, inserted in their agreement not $50,000, but $35,000, a virtual renewal of the sum that both the Senate and the House were trying to get rid of. The House provision was as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying mail over the bridges across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., over and above the regular rates for the transportation of the mail by railroad routes.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Speaker to this fact, and this is the crux of my argument: The regular rate for the transportation of mail by railroad routes in this country comprehends all the payments to railroads for the service of carrying the mails from terminal to terminal, housing the mails in transfer stations, furnishing men to carry the mails to any post office within 80 rods of a railroad anywhere, without cost to the Government. So the regular rate for the transportation of the mail by railroad comprehends not only the carriage of the mail upon the trains, but comprehends also the storage of the mail at stations. So the House, when it adopted this provision, that there should be no payment to the terminal trust at St. Louis over and above the regular rates for the transportation of mail by railroad routes, provided that no payment should be made to the St. Louis terminal trust for the heating and lighting of a place to store the mail, or for the place in which to store the mail.

The Senate, elaborating that idea and explaining it, passed this amendment, which I desire to read into the RECORD——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please read that part of the House bill?

Mr. MURDOCK. I did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would read it again.

Mr. MURDOCK. The House provision was—

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying mail over the bridges across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., over and above the regular rates for the transportation of the mail by railroad routes.

The SPEAKER. Now, will the gentleman read the Senate amendment?

Mr. MURDOCK. The Senate amendment elaborates that idea and makes a permanent elimination of this provision. It is:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for the special transfer and terminal service between the union station at East St. Louis, Ill., and the union station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of mail building and the transfer service at St. Louis, over and above regular rates for the transportation of the mail by railroad routes: Provided further, That section 3 of the act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department, approved March 1, 1899, authorizing the Postmaster General to pay from appropriations for transportation by railroad routes for the special transfer and terminal service between the union station at East St. Louis, Ill., and the union station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of mail building and the transfer service at St. Louis, at the rate not exceeding $50,000 per annum—— be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

So the Senate merely elaborated the House idea, and instead of making this apply to current law made it apply to permanent law. The Senate idea and the House idea are identical, and there was no essential difference between the House and the Senate, but when the conferees on the part of the House receded from their disagreement to the Senate amendment and then agreed to it with an amendment which proposes that there shall be paid to this Terminal Trust the sum of $35,000 for housing this mail at the terminal point, the House conferees exceeded their authority. I want now to read to the Speaker the amendment agreed to by the conferees:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., other than upon a mileage basis: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, pay within the present law a fair and reasonable price for the special transfer and terminal service at the Union Station at East St. Louis, Ill., and at the Union Station at St. Louis, Mo., including the use, lighting, and heating of the mail building and transfer service at St. Louis, Mo., provided the amount so paid shall not exceed $35,000.

Mr. Speaker, the House by its action did not give authority to the House conferees to write new law in a conference report giving the St. Louis Terminal Trust $35,000 for the housing of this mail, and when they proposed that amendment to the Senate amendment they exceeded their authority.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman contend that the $35,000 that is here provided for is simply for the purpose of housing the mail, or is the $35,000 that is appropriated here the limit of appropriation for the transfer of the mail from East St. Louis to St. Louis and for the heating and lighting and housing, and so forth?

Mr. MURDOCK. As a matter of fact, I would say to the gentleman from Missouri that it does not make any difference, but according to this amendment it could not be for the transfer from East St. Louis to St. Louis, because the conferees have interjected between the two transfer stations a mileage pay; that is, for the bridge. It happens that the matter is complicated in this way: There are about 3½ miles between the terminal station at East St. Louis and the terminal station at St. Louis upon which the Government has paid this exorbitant wage of $50,000 a year for the transfer of mail, when, as a matter of fact, on the mileage basis of the average daily weight, multiplied into distance, the pay of $7,000 would be fully adequate for that bridge. In the meanwhile the Merchants' Bridge, a little farther up the river, controlled by the same trust, has mail carried over it twice the amount that is carried over the Eades Bridge, which received this special payment; and the mail carriage over the Merchants' Bridge is paid, not by special payment, but upon the mileage basis, as every other bridge in this country is paid.

Mr. LLOYD. The point I make is, How much does the gentleman understand is paid for the heating and lighting of the terminal station by the provisions of this amendment?

Mr. MURDOCK. I suppose the trust could make any sort of figures it wishes upon that, but what about the heating and lighting at Toledo and Boston and San Francisco and Kansas City? They receive no pay there.

Mr. LLOYD. As I understand the gentleman, under the provisions of this bill, as agreed to by the House and the Senate, that part about which the gentleman makes no contention, the payment to be made on the mileage basis would amount to about $7,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think so.

Mr. LLOYD. While by the compromise provision between the House and the Senate the compensation that may be paid to the Terminal Railway Co. or to the railway companies would be $35,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; that is right.

Mr. LLOYD. Then there might be paid $28,000 for lighting and heating and for the use of the terminal facilities.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, no; because they have provided here that this pay on a portion of this bridge, at least on a part of this route, shall be upon the mileage basis.

Mr. LLOYD. It provides that the pay shall be on the mileage basis.

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly, and they will pay it undoubtedly upon the mileage basis, but my contention is that the conferees of the House have no right to write into a conference report a payment to the St. Louis Terminal Association for heating and lighting and the furnishing of rooms.

Mr. LLOYD. If I understand the gentleman's position it is this, that under existing law there is a payment of $50,000 a year for the transportation of that mail?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is right; over this one bridge.

Mr. LLOYD. Over this one bridge, and by the provisions of the Post Office bill as it passed the House there should only be paid about $7,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. There ought to be under the regular transportation by railroad route.

The SPEAKER. All this discussion is outside of the question. The only question involved in this point of order raised by the gentleman from Kansas is whether or not the conferees in bringing in this report exceeded their authority.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman need not bother——

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to make a statement on the merits of this proposition.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will not discuss the point of order, because it is clear that it is not well taken.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? I want to say to the gentleman I am going to discuss this on its merits later.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has already discussed it on its merits, and I think the gentleman's discussion has no foundation in view of the real facts——

Mr. MURDOCK. I think it has.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. With the permission of the House, I will say a word on the merits. While I realize it is out of order in the consideration of a point of order, I am convinced the Chair will hold the proposition is not in order as a whole in view of the Speaker's intimation on the point of order. I will not discuss it, the point of order. The gentleman from Kansas made a motion on the floor of the House when this bill was under consideration and added this proviso:

Provided, That no part of this apropriation shall be paid for carrying mail over the bridges across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., over and above the regular rate for the transportation of the mail by railroad route.

That was agreed to because the facts were not known and the gentleman's statement at that time was taken is correct, but this matter was brought under consideration in a hearing before the Senate committee and there we got the first information on the subject. The gentleman's argument proceeds upon the idea that all the railroads that carry this mail over the bridge own that bridge or have an interest in the bridge. But that is not the fact. The bridge company is a bridge corporation, a separate entity. There are several railroads which have some stock in it and the balance do not, but they pay tolls on the basis as any other corporation, and the railroad companies must pay if they use the bridge; those, of course, that have stock paying as well as the others, because there can be no readjustment of the interest between the bridge company and the railroad companies except as separate corporations.

The fact is shown that it costs $11,000 a year on the mileage basis to carry the mail over that bridge. This bridge company furnishes a house, light, handles the mails, and transports the cars. There are some 30,000 of them taken over annually. Private railroad companies pay $3 and the Government has been paying less than $1. The mileage basis would make $11,000 due the bridge company. They have testified before the Senate committee that it costs them every year more than $20,000 to transfer this mail, put it into this building, and for light and caring for this mail. Now, in view of the proof that the handling and carriage cost the bridge company the sum of $32,000 or $33,000 a year, in which there is not a cent of profit to the company, we thought that the just thing would be to provide a limit of compensation, not to the $50,000 we heretofore provided, but require or limit this appropriation under existing law to $35,000, a sum that would just about cover the cost to the bridge company for handling and hauling the mails. They can afford to do it, I assume, without any particular profit in view of the relation that exists between the companies that constitute any part of the bridge company, being a part of the railroad company, and it is clear this service could not be rendered for less money; but the committee, in order to protect the Government entirely, provided a limit upon this appropriation to the effect that it should not exceed $35,000 to cover all charges, as that will appear from this section, and we further provide that any amount reasonable and just for this special service over and above the mileage service should be paid by the Post Office Department, leaving the whole question——

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman when he got that information? Was that information he has given us before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. As I remarked when I began, not a particle of that testimony was there, or that the provision striking out the payment for this bridge ever was on the floor of the House. This information that I am now giving the House is from the Senate committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to get facts as to whether the committee of the House had that information.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Not at all. If we had had it as it is now——

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Tennessee wants to be fair in this matter. The gentleman knows perfectly well that the House committee has had previous hearings on this thing, and not hearsay, because one year in particular the department favored the elimination of this matter, while the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] was chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know anything about that. It may have been before other Congresses.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not before this Congress; but it was while the gentleman was a member of the committee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There may have been things that I did not know that I know now. I do not recollect. The question did not arise. But whether it did or not, the existing facts are as I have stated, and it is within the power of the Postmaster General under the section to give only a just and reasonable compensation, it being left as a subject of contract between the bridge company and the department. He could not give any more than was just and reasonable, I assume. But it appeared to us it might be reasonable and just to give a sum within the limitation of the $35,000 and not within $50,000 as heretofore has existed. Hence this provision.

If the Postmaster General thought that the transfer of the mail and the heating of this building, and so forth, were not worth more than, say, $5,000, he could not give over $5,000, or any other sum. It must be left in the discretion of the department. While I am not in favor of placing discretion in the departments in all things, there are some things where discretion has to be left there. When the House has fixed a proper maximum on a question of this sort, it is well to provide that a reasonable and just compensation within that limit may be given, and make that a subject of contract. That is a sensible way of doing business.

Eight of these railroads whose mail is carried over this bridge are under no contract with the Government to-day. They may dump that mail and force a diversion of the mails of the United States.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman think they would do it?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know whether they would do it or not. They have the right. The Second Assistant Postmaster General, a day or two ago, showed me telegrams from these railroad companies saying that they would not do this for nothing, and that their contract did not require them to carry it further than the east side of the river, and they would dump it there. The Postmaster General then said that "It might be a bluff. I do not know how it is, but I want some measure by which just action shall be taken with these companies, because I shall find it impossible to divert, even beginning with New York, more than 75 per cent of the mail if they refuse to carry it." Now, I understand that may be what you commonly call a "bluff" on the part of the railway company. It is immaterial whether it is or not. The facts are clear before us that the service rendered does not exceed in value $35,000, and it may reach that point. Therefore, we struck out $50,000 as a maximum. It appeared to us that the service might be worth less than $35,000, and, therefore, we provided it should not be more than reasonable and just, and we made it a subject of contract. It is useless to talk about a trust——

Mr. MURDOCK. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Just one minute. I do not yield now. It is useless for us to talk about trusts and corporations and raise a prejudice of that sort. I am as much opposed to the dominating trusts of this country that influence legislation as anybody, but I shall never consent while I have anything to do with legislation to do an unjust and dishonest thing because a trust is to be punished. [Applause.] I believe we ought to deal with trusts just as we ought to deal with individuals or anybody else.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman realize that the Supreme Court of the United States has condemned this same association as a trust?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not care whether it has condemned it or convicted it or not. If it was a trust, and if you as a representative of the Government came to deal with it afterwards, is it not your duty to deal with it justly and honestly? [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; but with justice to the Government. There are two bridges at St Louis. One of them is the Merchants' Bridge. That has not been condemned by the Supreme Court as a trust. Does the gentleman from Tennessee contend that the mail can not be transferred over the Merchants' Bridge, which is not paid under this special payment, but is paid on the mileage basis?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I only know about it as an administrative proposition and what the department says about it. The department says this service is necessary to the Government. Of course, as the chairman of a legislative committee I could not possibly know anything further than the administrative branch of the Government informs me. They are in adverse opinion to the views of the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. Twice within the last three weeks the Chair has rendered elaborate opinions on the very point involved here—not about these bridges, but on the very same parliamentary points.

The rule is clear, and it is a hundred years old; a little more than a hundred years, because it was established on the 23d day of June, 1812, by Mr. Speaker Clay. The rule is that a subject that is in a conference report must have been treated either by the House, or by an amendment of the Senate, or by a House amendment to a Senate amendment. It must be germane. That is all that there is in it. It is none of the business of the Chair what the effect of it is. All the Chair has to do with it is to say whether or not it is in accordance with the rules of the House.

Now, let us see. Mr. Speaker CANNON stated the matter in two or three sentences once in a very comprehensive manner, thus:

> It is true that if the whole paragraph in the bill as it passed the House had been stricken out—> and a substitute therefor proposed by the Senate, or if the Senate had stricken out the paragraph without proposing a substitute, and the House had disagreed to the Senate amendment, then the conferees might have had jurisdiction touching the whole matter and might have agreed upon any provision that would have been germane.
> And that is practically the case here—

That statement can not be improved on as to the rule. Let us see how this case fits the rule. The House provision was that—

> No part of this appropriation shall be paid for carrying the mail over the bridges across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., over and above the regular mileage rates for the transportation of the mail by railroad routes.

What is the subject of the words I have read? Why, it is carrying the mail from East St. Louis, Ill., to the city of St. Louis, Mo. That is all there is to that. What does the Senate amendment do? It treats of identically the same subject, and nothing else. What does this provision which has been put in by the conferees do? It treats of identically the same subject, and nothing else. If there ever was a case that fits the rule as laid down by Mr. Speaker CANNON, in which he simply followed all his predecessors, it is this one, and the point of order is overruled.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, after the reading of the statement on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, to which I am sure the House has given attention, it is perhaps not necessary for me to enter into any detailed explanation of the amendments made by the Senate and the consideration given by the conference committee to them. There were only about 126 amendments, and the greater portion of them were minor amendments. All of the amendments that were made were, in the opinion of the conferees, necessary, in that they provided for the pay to the various branches of the service.

The Senate proposed amendments in all amounting to $10,781,121. The bill as it passed the House carried $259,941,199, but it did not provide the money for many of the promotions which were provided by law, nor did it provide the full measure of compensation in many instances for services to be rendered.

The Senate, after the consideration of its amendments, receded, so far as dollars and cents were concerned, so that the report as made by the conferees shows $265,801,770.

In other words, in the conference committee half of the money added to this bill by the Senate was stricken off. The Senate additions, as I remarked, were nearly $11,000,000 and the total increase was about $6,000,000 in the conference report.

I shall not discuss the various amendments except briefly, and only two or three, in which the House seemed very much interested.

The classification section of this bill for the clerks and the proposition that was made to make postal clerks and railway mail clerks interchangeable at the discretion of the department, a provision that was placed upon the bill by the Senate, seemed to the conferees not to be good, because of the fact that the work was not of the same character and there would be no advantage in that interchange, and because of the power and grasp that the section proposed by the Senate would give to the department over the employees, carrying with it the power to remove a clerk from New York and put him on a railway train in California. We thought that unwise, and insisted upon our objections to it, and that section went out, and the reclassification proposition is before the House practically as it originally passed the House.

On the subject of what is known in the House as the gag law, the Senate offered an amendment that prohibited any organization of the employees from affiliating with any outside organization that imposed upon the Government employees the obligation to strike against the Government at the demand of an outside organization. We thought it was wise to accept that amendment of the Senate. Whatever our views may be as to the individual rights of employees—and they are pretty broad along those lines—we believed that when a man entered the postal service of the United States, just as when he enters the Army or the Navy of the United States, he should acknowledge no allegiance to any other power or authority outside that was greater than and above the United States. [Applause.] So we acceded to that proposition.

There was also a proposition upon this bill that provided for the Government paying rent, or hire, if I may so express it, to the States for the use of their roads for post-road purposes. The Senate saw proper to disagree to that action of the House. The action in the House on that proposition was almost unanimous. We were unable to get the Senate to recede from that position under any conditions. Therefore, in order that this question of good roads, the building of post roads, and the uplifting socially and economically of the people of the country by this means should not be lost in the consideration of this question, that it should remain before the House and before the country, we offered a proposition to the Senate by which a commission should be appointed to investigate fully the question of good roads, the feasibility and desirability of legislation along that line, the manner of cooperation between States, counties, and the United States—in fact, the whole question—and provided for a commission which is to report to this House at a later day. We also provided for the sum of $500,000 to be used to experiment, practically, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture and the Postmaster General, for the purpose of obtaining information along lines necessary to the perfection of the good-roads proposition. The Senate accepted these propositions, and they are now contained in this report.

Another question in which the House was very greatly interested, and one in which I believe the Members felt more personal interest perhaps than any other question involved in this bill, was the parcel-post proposition. We have come back to the House with a perfected bill upon this subject. The House will remember that when the Post Office bill was brought before the House it came with a proposition for rural parcel post, 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each pound thereafter, to the limit of 11 pounds for 25 cents.

On the floor of the House the substitute was offered by me, which gave 5 cents for the first pound and 1 cent a pound thereafter and confining it to the rural routes. The Senate, passing upon this question, struck out this provision of the House entirely and adopted a general parcel-post proposition, which, however, can only be experimental in view of the appropriation that was made, by which the country was divided into eight zones and rates fixed in each of those zones for transportation of the mail, with the provision that the rates should not anywhere exceed 12 cents a pound.

It will be remembered that the House afterwards instructed the conferees, adopting an instruction to the effect that a different system of zones, taking the county as the initial, should be perfected, and the Post Office Department should have the power to change rates and zones and weights according to its experience, and that indemnity should be given for lost packages and provision made for C. O. D. packages.

A commission was also provided for further inquiry into this question of parcel post.

That briefly is the history of the legislation up to the conference report. The conferees have presented to the House the Senate bill adopting the zone feature, with the rates as fixed in the Senate bill so amended as to include farm and factory products, and limiting it to 11 pounds. It also embraces the original proposition of the House that gives rural posts 5 cents for 1 pound and 1 cent for each pound after that up to 11 pounds. It includes the House proposition that no rate in the United States shall be over 12 cents per pound.

It includes the House proposition on the question of indemnity and C. O. D. delivery and an elastic proposition which was placed in the bill which gives the Post Office Department the right to change the zones, to change the rates, and to change the general condition of administration of the whole service, not at its will, but upon application to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with its approval.

That is substantially the details of this bill. We feel that it meets the demands of the farmer, as provided in the House measure, thoroughly, certainly within a zone of 50 to 150 miles; and that, on account of the rate fixed in the second zone, a distance of 300 miles, it will be impossible for the interests of the small towns in the country, the commercial welfare of the county centers, to be affected, and trade which legitimately belongs to them concentrated in the great mail-order houses of the country.

Of course the whole question is experimental. No one can definitely know the effect that it will have on the commerce of the country; no one can know just the amount of revenue, or approximate that; but in order to save the Government on this experiment it is provided that the Postmaster General shall have the power and control over the administration of the service, and that he shall under no conditions permit the cost of this service to the Government to exceed the revenues that come from it. We believe that this is a safe proposition; we believe that it is as nearly just to the farmers and merchants and the whole masses of the people as any we could evolve. Its administration must be left to the department; its efficacy must be determined later on by experiment. It is but the beginning of a great system of transportation by mail that we feel will be beneficial to the masses of the country.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that that is all, unless some inquiry is desired to be made on the subject, and I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will yield, how much does the bill carry as a total?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The Senate amendments put on $10,781,121. The bill carried $259,941,199. As agreed to by the conferees the bill carries $265,801,770, or about $5,000,000 less than the Senate amendments amounted to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman states that the bill carried two hundred and fifty-nine million and odd thousand dollars. Taking the accurate total of the bill, it was $261,000,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The statement was made by the clerk, and I think the gentleman from New York is correct. I believe it was the last bill that carried two hundred and fifty-nine millions, and the present bill carries two hundred and sixty-one millions as it passed the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What I wish to know is, does the gentleman, in arriving at the total, take the accurate footings of the items in the bill, or does he take the totals which are stated, which, in many instances, are incorrect? For instance, the total of the railway mail clerks appears in the report published in the RECORD $1,978,029 short of the actual footings of the items.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman will recollect that in that section a mistake was made. That is the reason for the suppression of that report, filed last evening. It is $1,000,000 short there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the clerks in post offices the accurate footing of the items is $1,942,800 in excess of the total given in the report, so that that will make the bill carry actually $2,920,829 more than appears from an examination by totals, allowing for the $1,000,000 error.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course, I do not know exactly what the totals are. I have not figured them myself. These are the totals as figured by the clerk, who has made these totals for years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Heretofore the practice had been, after setting out the items for this service, to provide that not to exceed a certain sum, which was a lump sum, should be expended, and that would control in spite of the act of May 28, 1896. In that way totals could be taken. It is my recollection that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of order——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; that is the way that it went out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Upon some of these matters, but while that limitation was taken out of the bill and does not appear in it——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That does appear in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The total does not control. The statute of May 28, 1896, provides:

> That the total amount appropriated in the various paragraphs of an appropriation act shall be determined by the correct footing up of the specific sums or rates appropriated in each paragraph, unless otherwise expressly provided.

In attempting to ascertain the total amounts appropriated by this Congress, an examination of the bill shows that these totals are not accurate footings of the items. In the absence of the restrictions heretofore carried in the bill the actual footings will count.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course that section went out on a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true, but I think it went back in the Senate—no; the Senate struck that out also. I did not know whether the gentleman had there and was able to state whether the totals had been changed to correspond to the accurate footings or not.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is what the Clerk undertook to do. Whether it is done exactly in the total, I am unable to say.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I think I can explain to the gentleman's satisfaction in reference to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not explain the difference between the alleged footing and an accurate footing.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I can. The gentleman obtains his total by multiplying the number of clerks by the respective salaries, but every Post Office appropriation bill since I have been in the House has carried more clerks multiplied by the salaries than the appropriation that was carried in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but there was always the provision that not to exceed a certain total should be expended.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There is no such provision in the law of the last fiscal year, and the same situation was presented. For instance, the total for clerks this year carried by this bill——

Mr. FITZGERALD. But for the last fiscal year the Treasury held that the amount that actually footed up to the total was what controlled under this statute to which I have called attention.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is mistaken about the Treasury holding.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not, because I have had it investigated, and I have the information.

Mr. MANN. So have I had it investigated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe the source of my information is a little more accurate than the gentleman's, however accurate his may be. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The trouble with the gentleman is that he has not followed the Post Office appropriation bill as carefully as I have in recent years, and misses a point. In those cases where the law provides for the automatic promotion the promotion is made, notwithstanding the limitation in the appropriation, and that creates a deficiency appropriation, which has to go through the gentleman's committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There never has been such a deficiency.

Mr. MANN. It would be, however, if there were any occasion for it. Now, the situation is this: Suppose you provide for 1,000 clerks or 10,000 clerks at $1,000 each salary, and then you do not appropriate the full amount of money which was provided for all of these clerks. This was the case for years. Why, of course, you do not start in at the beginning of a fiscal year with the full number of clerks, and hence you do not require the full appropriation. The appropriation bill says so many assistant superintendents, so many clerks at such and such a salary. If you multiply the number by the salary, you would get the total amount of appropriation if they all held office for the full 12 months of the fiscal year, but that is not the case in the Post Office Department. There being an increase of number every year, many clerks are not appointed until the second quarter, many not appointed until the third quarter, and many not appointed until the fourth quarter, hence they are not required to appropriate the full sum, and that is the situation in this case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not required, but the act itself makes the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I think I am as well informed as the gentleman is, and I know under the law——

Mr. MANN. I do not see that makes any difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In casting up the appropriations made by the Congress the accurate footing exceeds the totals unless the restrictive provision——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman misses this point. There is only one place where you appropriate by classes. If you appropriate in one place $100 and in another place $200 and make a total $200, the law provides the total shall be $300, and there is but one place on an appropriation bill where you could appropriate the full sum of money. In this case in reference to clerks it is $37,878,000, and it is the only place where that could be appropriated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is another class the gentleman overlooks, railway-mail clerks.

Mr. MANN. Well, the same situation applies to mail clerks and carriers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What I am calling the gentleman's attention to is there is a difference here of $2,920,827.

Mr. MANN. I called it to the attention of the House when the Post Office bill was under consideration, and gave the actual figures of what the appropriation would need to be if we appropriated for the full number of clerks, but no one has ever claimed in a Post Office bill since I have been a Member of the House that you had to appropriate for the full number of clerks for the entire fiscal year, because we increase the number from year to year, and they are not all appointed on the first of the fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are not required to be appropriated, but in making up the table, unless the limitation that has heretofore been in the bill is in the bill, you actually foot up totals which do not agree with the totals given.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from New York is satisfied with the explanation made, I will not take up any time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am pretty familiar with the matter, and I am correct in my statement that these totals will not be controlling, and if the total of this bill is made up by computing the two totals, one for the post-office clerks of $21,465,171, railway-mail clerks and post-office clerks, $37,878,000, then the total carried in this bill is $2,390,000 less than it actually carries.

Mr. WEEKS. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from New York, in addition to what has already been stated by the gentleman from Illinois, there is one reason why the total amount is not equal to the number of clerks multiplied by the salary which they receive, because the promotions are made quarterly. If all promotions were made at the beginning of the year it would require the amount of money the gentleman from New York suggests, but they are made the 1st of July or the 1st of October or they are made the 1st of January and the 1st of the following April, and therefore it does not require as much money as the gentleman states.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If that was as simple as the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Illinois assert, the gentleman from Illinois would not have made the point of order against the provision of the bill, because ordinarily when the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order to eliminate from an appropriation bill a provision which is a restriction he has a definite purpose in mind, and that is to remove the limitation fixed in the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from New York, speaking of the post-office clerks' appropriation of $38,693,000, that this is the total amount that would be required if all grades were to be entirely filled all the year, which is not the case, because of automatic promotions. And I understood the gentleman to insist he desired the total expenditures under the act for the whole of the fiscal year not to exceed the amounts appropriated. That provision is in the bill.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I will state why I made the point of order, which is perfectly plain. I made the point of order because the provision in the bill would have limited the automatic promotions to the amount of the appropriation named in the bill, although the law provided that the automatic promotions should take place when the clerks and carriers were entitled to them, and in order that the department would be justified in meeting a deficiency if a deficiency were needed to pay the automatic promotions.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. This bill provides a sufficient amount of money for automatic promotions during the whole year. If it does not, there is authority to create a deficiency.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me five minutes?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides, as agreed upon by the conferees, for the appointment of several commissions. One of these, perhaps the most important, is a commission, consisting of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House, to investigate the question of parcel post, the rates, and the zones, and the other provisions of the bill relating to that subject. The three Members of the House are, by the provisions of this conference report, to be appointed by the Speaker.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know that the custom has long existed that to fill places of this kind the Speaker should take the commission from the members of the Post Office Committee. There are other commissions provided for where there is no doubt but that by following the rule the Speaker would not only follow the precedents, but would satisfy all the membership of the House. But we have in this House one Member who, upon the question of parcel post and express rates, is perhaps the best expert in the United States, if not in the world. [Applause.] He has made a study for 15 or 20 years of this question, until he is a living, walking encyclopedia upon the proposition, and it seems to me that I am not going too far, Mr. Speaker, if I might humbly suggest to the Speaker, and I believe I express the sentiment of every Member of this House [applause], that when he comes to appoint that commission he appoint as one member of it the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish the gentleman would yield me eight or nine minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will yield the gentleman more time if he really desires it.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman have 10 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to this House just one thing, and I say it in rather a kindly spirit. You have had an illustration here to-night, when a thing gets into the law, of how difficult it is to get it out.

Some years ago when the Eads Bridge was constructed across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, it was looked upon as a work of wonder, a modern miracle, and it was through an appreciation of this great mechanical achievement that Congress was persuaded to give a special favor of $50,000 a year for the transportation of the mail across that bridge, then the only bridge crossing the Mississippi at that point. Through the years, against fight after fight, that payment was continued, exorbitant at the start and always exorbitant. Afterwards other bridges were constructed across the river at St. Louis. The Eads Bridge was no longer a great mechanical achievement. It no longer had a monopoly across that stream. But a monopoly grew up in St. Louis which took over that bridge and charged everything and everybody tolls, and took over the other bridges at St. Louis.

Now, some eight or nine years ago this special mail payment was challenged. It was repeatedly brought up in the committees of the House and in the Senate, and finally one of the Post Office Committees of this House adopted a repeal of this payment to the terminal association. It came out here on the floor of this House as part of the appropriation bill. A single Member, under the rules of this House, could raise a point of order against it and put it out of the bill, and a single Member did—a Member from the city of St. Louis. Afterwards the thing was again discussed in Congress, and finally this year this House succeeded in putting through an amendment which took this payment away, a payment which is not warranted by the facts. The bill went to the Senate. The minute the bill went there with this amendment the officials of the St. Louis Terminal Trust, one that has been condemned by the Supreme Court of the United States, one that has St. Louis by the throat, both as regards her wharfage and her ferriage across the Mississippi River, as well as the bridge service, came down here and presented arguments before the Senate committee. You have heard what those arguments were from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. How profound, how moving they must have been, when, as a result of the data placed before that committee by the officials of the St. Louis trust, the United States Senate drafted a more drastic provision than the House provision, taking out of all law for all time this payment of $50,000 a year. Here was your House of Representatives demanding that this sum go out of the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman? Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say that the conferees of the Senate very readily yielded to the proposition, and the Senate approved it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, yes; but I will say to the gentleman that the Senate committee, backed up by the United States Senate, put into the bill, after the hearings, a more drastic provision than the House provision, cutting this matter out, and here it went finally to conference.

Now, both legislative branches of this Government had finally done away with this proposition of an extra payment of $50,000 to a trust—a payment that is not made to any other railroad or terminal association or union station in the United States. It was out. Then the conference committee restored the major part of that sum. I tell this House that it is unjustifiable, it is unwarranted; it is not justified by the facts, except as they are given by the selfish terminal association of St. Louis.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The House has not done anything of the sort, and the Senate has not done anything of the sort. The proposition heretofore was a payment of $50,000, which was regarded as mandatory. Now, the proposition is to limit it to $35,000, on the condition that it costs that, and it is directory, and it is left alone in the discretion of the Post Office Department.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, the gentleman knows that the $50,000 payment has also been for 11 years in the discretion of the department, but notwithstanding that, the trust got the $50,000 every year during that period of 11 years, and twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars over and above the legitimate earning of the railroad in the carriage of the mails. Now, it is not given to any other railroad of the United States. It is not given to the union stations elsewhere, or to the railroads anywhere else, but it is given there as an extra stipend, and I say it is unjustifiable.

This House has the facts before it. It would take only a very few minutes for this House to grant me unanimous consent to have a separate vote taken on this St. Louis item and send this bill back to conference and demand that either this item go out of the bill or that the original Senate amendment to the bill stand. The principle of the thing, if not the sum involved, would seem to dictate and demand that sort of action.

Now, I want to state to the gentleman from Tennessee that I fought this thing for years and years. I thought the gentleman from Tennessee had a thorough knowledge of it. He has been a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for a number of years, and this matter has been put before the House heretofore.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I know what the gentleman says about it, but the facts conflict with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, the facts furnished by the terminal association may conflict. If the facts pointed out in this House by the gentleman from Tennessee are well founded, why did they not move the United States Senate? They moved the House conferees of this body.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman would make it appear that they had moved the House conferees and the Senate also.

Mr. MURDOCK. They did not move the Senate.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. They have moved the Senate because it has passed it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Before the gentleman from Tennessee now makes his motion to concur, I would like to ask unanimous consent, and I ask unanimous consent, that there be a separate vote taken now upon the St. Louis bridge item.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the facts and the absolute control over the question by the department—and the department might not give a cent if it did not want to—and in view of the entire justice of the provision, I think the request is absurd, and, of course, I object to it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Is this a final and full report?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. You could reject the report by unanimous consent or vote it down, but there is no possible way that you can pick out this exact item and get rid of it except by rejecting the conference report.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understand that is so.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say repeatedly that you could do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, if the gentleman will pardon me, that is on a par with the general run of the gentleman's statements. It seems to me he is talking to far-away Kansas, rather than talking to the facts as they are. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I am trying to talk of the facts as they are to this House, and to say that in this House a thing ought to be remedied that was not remedied when the House was under the gentleman's régime.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman will vote against agreeing to this conference report, and if there is a majority that votes with him, the thing is all off, and the bill goes back to conference if the House further insists on its disagreement. The gentleman from Kansas has been long enough a Member of this House not to appeal to the citizens of Kansas, whence he has lately returned from a successful contest for renomination; and if he preached, as I am informed he did, along this line out there, I guess he fooled enough people to get it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I never succeeded in getting anything under his régime in this House, and that I am now trying to get something corrected that it was impossible to correct under him, and which it will not be impossible to correct now. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] yield to me?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois further.

Mr. CANNON. While I had the honor to be Speaker of this House and a Member of the House nothing was ever done except by a majority of the House, and this will not be done except by a majority of the House; and the gentleman does not do credit to his intelligence or his knowledge, which, in my opinion, the gentleman has, when he talks to the galleries about unanimous consent to single out this exact thing and vote on it, when he knows, as every Member of the House knows, that it is in the power of a majority of the House here and now to disagree to this conference report.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, and the gentleman knows also that you can do anything by unanimous consent, and that unanimous consent is a great deal more difficult to get than a majority.

Mr. CANNON. There is nothing that can be done by unanimous consent touching a conference report, except by unanimous consent to reject it, and it does not require every Member in the House to reject it. It only requires a majority, if a majority is with the gentleman, to vacate this conference report.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I made a request for unanimous consent to have a separate vote upon this one item, No. 60.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kansas yield——

Mr. MURDOCK. I have a right to have my request for unanimous consent presented.

Mr. MANN. Pending the presentation of it will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. While it is quite true that it is within the power of the House by unanimous consent to do anything within the jurisdiction of the House, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it is wholly beyond the power of the House by unanimous consent to do something which requires the action of both the House and the Senate. The Senate has already agreed to this conference report as a whole. Now it is not within the power of the House by unanimous consent or otherwise to agree to a part of the conference report coming from the Senate after it has been agreed to there.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman that if a majority of the House should vote against this one item we would certainly reject that portion of the conference report.

Mr. MANN. You can not reject that portion of the conference report. You can reject the conference report as a whole. The conference report having been agreed to in the Senate as a whole, it is not within the power of the House, under the rules that govern the practice between the two bodies, to agree to a part of the conference report and reject another part.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that it is not the contention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that we could agree to a part and disagree to a part of this conference report.

Mr. MANN. That was his request.

Mr. NORRIS. But he wants to give information to the Senate, if we disagree, as to why we do disagree. It is conceded, I think, by the gentleman from Kansas that if we reject this one item it does reject the entire conference report, but if we should do that the Senate would know just why we did it, and so they would know what to rectify.

Mr. MANN. If the conference report should be rejected, of course, the House could then vote upon any Senate amendment, but the request of the gentleman was to have a separate vote upon disagreeing to this one item in the conference report. Therefore, I submit to the gentleman that it is not possible.

Mr. NORRIS. We can have a separate vote——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I make the point of order on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. This conference report does not stand like an ordinary bill with an amendment to it. It has been ruled time out of mind that a conference report must be adopted or rejected as a whole. If the House agrees with the gentleman from Kansas in his objections to this conference report, the House has its remedy, and that is to vote down the conference report.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the House made an order yesterday that gentleman who had bills on the Private Calendar might call them up by unanimous consent to-day. The entire day has been taken up by other business, and I ask unanimous consent that that order may continue in force during to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. It is one day until the House adjourns.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But to-morrow will be another day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should prefer to remain here later to-night rather than to continue the order to to-morrow. There will be time enough to make the request when we adjourn.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are a number of resolutions relating to printing in which Members of the House are interested, and I have promised to bring them up. They are privileged, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I understand the gentleman from Illinois has objected.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has already objected, and that is the end of it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in taking five minutes is to say that it seems to me that the House does not fully understand the St. Louis bridge matter, and I am confident from what the gentleman from Kansas has said that he does not himself understand the facts.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for hauling the mail to the city of New York receives pay on a mileage basis through the tunnel and into its terminal. That is all it is entitled to. Any other railroad terminating, as does the Pennsylvania Railroad, in New York receives pay up to the terminal on a mileage basis, and that is all it is entitled to. For that pay it performs other duties. It furnishes space for the clerks of the Post Office Department, it furnishes light for that space, trucks for unloading the mails, tracks for the cars to stand on, and various other facilities, for which it receives no compensation whatever.

Now, in a station like the Union Station in Washington, which is owned by four or five railroads, the same condition prevails because every railroad which transports mail receives mileage up to the terminal, and therefore there is no reason for paying any additional compensation for handling the mail at the terminal.

Now, the St. Louis terminal is an entirely different proposition. There is nothing like it in the United States. The Eads Bridge is owned by 15 corporations—8 west of the river and 7 east of the river. The 7 east of the river have the long haul to it, and there is no reason why any additional compensation should be paid them. But the 8 owners of the bridge west of the river have no benefit whatever from the haulage of mail that goes into St. Louis from the east, and they are obliged to furnish terminal facilities, clerks, and light for which they get no compensation whatever if only mileage is paid them. Furthermore, there are 5 railroads east of the river that terminate in East St. Louis, and those railroads dump their mail on the terminal company, which takes it across the river, receiving as compensation the mileage basis across the river, or 4 miles. As a matter of fact, it actually costs $20,000 or thereabouts for the clerk hire and for the actual money paid out by the terminal company in connection with the terminal facilities.

The mileage basis across the bridge would be $11,900, or a total definite payment of about $32,000 for the mileage and the actual money paid out by these railroads for the service which they perform. I do not think it is just to ask a corporation or a series of corporations to perform a service without repaying the money which it actually costs them to perform the service.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am asking entirely for information. I do not claim to know anything about it. I want to get at the facts. The gentleman has made the same statement that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] made, that the cost to this company for transporting mails was a certain amount.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not said anything about transporting mails.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood it to mean that.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not mean that at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to know, for my information, how you can determine and how they do determine what the cost is?

Mr. WEEKS. Let me tell the gentleman what they transfer across that bridge. They transfer 33,000 carloads of mail a year, 100 cars a day. For this they furnish the trackage and all terminal facilities, and you ask them to do it for the mileage basis alone, without paying them anything for the terminals.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to know what the items of cost to the bridge company are of doing this work? How do you get at them? How do you compute it?

Mr. WEEKS. The $20,000 cost to the terminal company is for clerk hire, for light, for the handling of the mail, and for other facilities that are actually furnished, and for which cash is paid out. That does not take into consideration at all the hauling of the cars across the bridge, for which they receive $3 a car when it is done for any other service than for the United States Government, which would amount to $100,000 a year for hauling the cars across the bridge alone. Now, you ask them to do it on a mileage basis, and in eight cases the railroad which is furnishing the terminal has no benefit whatever for the haulage of the mail up to East St. Louis.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The mail goes into St. Louis on two bridges.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Merchants' Bridge and the Eads Bridge.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows when he makes this statement that the mail goes over the Merchants' Bridge, paid for on the usual rates of mileage.

Mr. WEEKS. I know perfectly well——

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will let me conclude—and that twice the amount of mail comes in over the Merchants' Bridge, which is paid for on the regular scale, than comes in over the Eads Bridge, for which $50,000 is paid.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but the gentleman from Kansas knows perfectly well that both bridges are owned by the same company.

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly; and why should we pay extra for one and not for the other?

Mr. WEEKS. And he knows perfectly well that the terminal company loses money every day on the service which it is performing over the Merchants' Bridge.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman would if he would examine the facts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee lacks only half a minute of expiring.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report, and on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the adoption of the conference report, and on that motion he demands the previous question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock a. m. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman from Kansas withdraw his point of no quorum? Here it is, Friday night. To-morrow is Saturday, and the gentleman knows that there is no quorum in town. On the whole, I consider that we have won quite a victory in the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill, and even upon the item itself that the gentleman refers to there has been some victory won. If a point of no quorum is made, it is probable that Congress will be in session another week or perhaps two weeks.

Now, we have been here—I am not casting any reflections upon the gentleman—but there are a lot of us here who have very good reasons for wanting to get home, and I do not think that the gentleman wants to take the responsibility——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope we will have a roll call so those of us who have stayed here all summer may have our presence noted.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe there is a quorum in town, and I do not believe there is a quorum that can be obtained on a roll call for another week.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the thing to do is to have this St. Louis bridge matter settled now, and I raise the point of no quorum.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman makes the point of order I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following House joint resolution, which provides for the payment of the employees of the House and the Senate on the day of adjournment.

Mr. MANN. I think we will be here after the 1st of September, so for the present I object.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let us get all of the Chautauqua lecturers in their places. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas again to withhold his point of order?

Mr. MURDOCK. I withhold it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock a. m.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, what good will that do?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hear none, and it is so ordered. Does the gentleman from Kansas adhere to his point of order?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAY. Is the question now before the House that of the adoption of the conference report?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Kansas made a point that there was no quorum present, and he simply withheld it for the gentleman from Alabama to make a request for unanimous consent. Of course, if the gentleman from Kansas——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Kansas at least to permit the Chair to put the question to the House on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood the motion had been made to concur.

The SPEAKER. No; the motion was on the adoption of the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-nine gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is evident we can not get a quorum here to-night—— [Cries of "Call the roll!"]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, let us call the attention of the country to this evil of absenteeism and point out the men who do not stay here.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let us try to get a quorum.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, from the statement it is not a question of Members here now, but there has been absenteeism practically of Members who have gotten here in the last 24 hours, and why should they raise the point of order upon the rest of us; why should they come in and raise this question——

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House for debate. Does the gentleman from Alabama make his motion to adjourn?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether or not the Speaker had put the motion and if the automatic rule does not apply?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the automatic rule applies. The House is dividing, the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 24, answered "present" 10, not voting 227, as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 24, 1912.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, as our labors draw to their close we render unto Thee unspeakable thanks for the mercies which have accompanied all our days. Day by day we have sought Thee, and not in vain have we lifted to Thee our voice in prayer. Thou hast not sent us empty away, neither hast Thou left us to labor in our own unaided strength. It is Thine hand which hath upheld us, as it is Thy providence which hath guided us. We acknowledge Thy guidance and thank Thee for Thy loving kindness. Accept, we pray Thee, our labors and consecrate all our endeavors as seemeth good in Thy sight. Thou hast not left our hearts untouched by sorrow, neither hast Thou taken from us the comfort of Thy presence. Our sorrows no less than our labors we consecrate to Thee.

And now, our Father, as we go our several ways we pray Thee to bless and keep us, to make Thy face to shine upon us and shield us with Thy grace, to lift up the light of Thy countenance upon us and to give us peace. Amen.

NEW ORLEANS PROGRESSIVE UNION,
Per LEON C. SIMON, Acting President.

RANK OF RETIRED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SHIVELY. On March 8, 1912, Senate bill No. 5722, to remedy in the line of the Army the inequalities in rank due to the past system of regimental promotion was introduced, and on that day read twice and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That bill has been pending for many weeks before a subcommittee of that committee. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs certain memorandum bearing upon the merits of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum is as follows:

Memorandum.

A bill (S. 5722) to readjust the rank of certain officers on the retired list who served in the Army during the Civil War.

Measures for the relief sought have been presented to Congress for many years. In the last Congress the officers on the active list were granted relief in the last clause of the Army appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1911, but the provision did not apply to officers on the retired list.

The reasons favorable to the legislation enacted in the act of March 3, 1911, above referred to, were fully set forth in a memorandum of the Chief of Staff (Gen. Bell) which was transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, on April 1, 1908, by Secretary of War Taft, with remarks, in part, as follows:

"I have carefully read this bill (H. R. 16502) and the accompanying memorandum thereon by the Chief of Staff. I fully and cordially concur in this effort to bring about a gradual readjustment of rank for the sole purpose of promoting the greater efficiency of the Army. At the same time I think the officers who have lost rank through no lack of merit and no fault of their own have a just claim in equity and are entirely deserving of the relief contemplated by this bill."

RULES OF PROMOTION.

The Chief of Staff, in his memorandum, said:

"Under the system of promotion which so long prevailed, whereby officers were promoted by virtue of seniority in the regiment to include the grade of captain and of seniority in the arms through the field grades, many inequalities arose in the relative rank of officers and in the conditions which surrounded officers in the military service. This may be made clear by considering two officers, approximately of the same age, entering the service at the same date, but assigned to different regiments. In one regiment where casualities through death, retirement, resignations, or other causes were frequent, the subaltern assigned there advanced with comparative rapidity through the grades of second and first lieutenant to captain and took his place on the lineal list for promotion through the field grades perhaps years before the other, assigned to a regiment where casualties were few, could reach it. If it is to be remembered that not two officers but every officer entering the service during this period entered under these conditions the growth of inequalities in rank and position may be appreciated. Not only officers of the same age and date of commission were thus later widely separated, but not infrequently officers of long service were passed by their juniors in years and service. A captain under these conditions was likely at any time to see a man who had entered the service long after him become his post, battalion, or squadron commander.

"It is to be borne in mind that no question of relative merit entered into the question of promotion under these rules, just as no such question enters into the problem that the proposed act is now intended to solve. Officers attained the higher grades through what may be termed the accident of law, or, as many believed, of incorrect construction of the law.

"When this occurred through a rule that put promotion outside of the influence of individual effort or ability, it seems impossible to deny reasonable cause for those not favored by chance to feel themselves unwarrantably injured.

"Furthermore, neither the proposed law nor any other can restore all that the losers have lost or take away anything the gainers have gained. The latter have held for many years rank and position and received increased pay that under an equitable system of promotion would have been secured to those who now seek future restoration only to their proper places. What has been lost in the past can not be restored, nor is it sought by this measure to attempt its restoration.

"The proposed measure does not provide any relief for officers on the retired list who may have suffered equally in the past with others still in the active service.

"In my judgment, therefore, the conclusion is inevitable that we are concerned here not so much with the law as with the equity of the case. If injustice has been done through the operation of law, and it matters not whether the law as applied was correctly interpreted or not, such injustice should be corrected if correction be possible, and provided, of course, that the methods employed do not result in a greater evil than the evil they are designed to remove."

The pending measure is for the relief of certain officers on the retired list, a number of whom are medal of honor men, and the reasons which induced legislation of 1911 for officers on the active list apply with still greater force to the officers on the retired list, for they have suffered longer and have an added claim for favorable consideration, because of their service in the Army during the Civil War. It applies to the officers on the retired list below the grade of brigadier general who served in the Army during the Civil War prior to April 15, 1865. The number in February, 1912, was 189 officers, consisting of 25 colonels, 40 lieutenant colonels, 85 majors, 34 captains, and 5 first lieutenants, as shown by the accompanying list. It is stated as an objection to the measure that these officers have been advanced a grade by the act of 1904 for their Civil War service. But the reasons which induced the legislation in 1911 in favor of the officers on the active list were not based upon nor had they any reference to Civil War service. The reasons for that legislation were fully and clearly stated by the Chief of Staff [Gen. Bell] in the memorandum above referred to, and they apply equally to the officers on the retired list, and hence the measure is drawn to apply to the advanced rank on which they were retired, and it gives them no greater relief than has been granted to the officers on the active list by the act of 1911.

The list includes some staff officers and many line officers, and on this point it is to be observed that there were great inequalities in promotion in the staff, as well as in the line, resulting from legislation which gave much more rapid promotion in some staff corps than in others, and the arguments advanced apply with equal force to those officers who saw their juniors in years and in date of original commission attain promotion which they could not reach, and in these cases, also, it should be remembered that there was no question of merit involved.

The measure does not affect the Army either in its discipline or in the prospect of any active officer for promotion. It can therefore be considered on its merits as a pure question of right without fear of discrimination against any officer.

Instead of a long and exhaustive search of the records to ascertain just what position an officer might have reached, and which might still result in injustice by reason of mistake, or oversight, or other cause it is proposed to grant an advance of one grade for each period of 15 years' service (active or retired) in the regular or volunteer forces on or after April 15, 1861, provided that the rank conferred shall not exceed that of a brigadier general. This period of 15 years is a modification of a suggestion made by Gen. U. S. Grant, that certain officers be advanced a grade for each period of 10 years on the retired list, and is a much greater period of time than that served by officers on the active list in any one grade; this provision, then, will give no greater promotion than that granted to officers on the active list by the act of 1911, and will be much easier to carry into execution.

Those who will be benefited by the measure feel that there has been further discrimination and favoritism in the matter of the selection of officers for promotion to the grade of brigadier general just prior to their retirement, and they feel the discrimination more keenly because much younger men with no Civil War record have been so promoted from the grades of major and lieutenant colonel and immediately retired. Thus in their declining years, when naturally under greater expense, they find themselves resting not on an equality with their comrades but in the unenviable position of having their juniors in years and in service retired with superior rank, a discrimination which subjects them to unjust comparisons and which can only be explained on the ground that some were more highly favored.

The War Department earnestly recommended the legislation referred to for officers on the active list "for the sole purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Army," but Secretary of War Dickinson withheld favorable recommendation for this measure for the relief of the retired officers similarly situated because of the need of economy. The expense involved is not great and will rapidly diminish, because the average age of the beneficiaries is over 73 years. The question whether it was right to grant the relief asked for was settled affirmatively by the act of 1911, but it was applied to the active list only. The officers on the retired list therefore confidently rely for favorable action in their behalf upon the views expressed by Secretary (now President) Taft, that they have "a just claim in equity and are entirely deserving of the relief contemplated."

Under the foregoing measure the 25 colonels and 40 lieutenant colonels would become brigadier generals retired. The 83 majors would become colonels, retired. The 32 captains would become lieutenant colonels, retired. The 5 first lieutenants would become majors, retired.

The officers retired since the Civil War as major generals and brigadier generals without Civil War record number a total of 63. These 63 officers without Civil War record were promoted over the 185 officers of Civil War record, who pray for the relief in the foregoing memorandum.

CLAIMS FOR NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY (S. DOC. NO. 948).

Mr. SWANSON. There is pending before the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (S. 6247) introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] for a settlement of the claims of Virginia and other States on account of the gift by Virginia of the northwestern territory. The General Assembly of Virginia directed her Representatives in Congress to present that claim. At the time I submitted a message of the general assembly which stated the facts in reference to the matter, with a report from Dr. Fulton, who had examined it thoroughly. The report is not a very long one. Also, on Virginia day at the Jamestown Exposition, I made an address in reference to this concession and the many contributions that Virginia had made to the national greatness. I submit the papers and ask that they be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary so that the Judiciary Committee can consider them in connection with the consideration of the bill introduced by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would it not be well to have the speech of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] incorporated in the document?

Mr. SWANSON. I accept the suggestion also to include in the public document the speech made by the Senator from West Virginia for the use of the Judiciary Committee in considering this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

SPEECHES OF JUDGE PARKER AND GOV. MARSHALL (S. DOC. NO. 947).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On behalf of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], who is temporarily absent, I desire to request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the speech of Judge Parker notifying Gov. Marshall of his nomination as the vice presidential candidate of the Democratic Party and Gov. Marshall's reply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF JUDGE ALTON B. PARKER.

Mr. Chairman, Gov. Marshall, gentlemen of the national committee and of the executive committee, fellow members of the nominating committee, ladies and gentlemen, the faithful sons of Democracy, proud of the record of their party covering a period of 50 years of Federal administration, welcomed at Baltimore the opportunity to substitute practice for preaching, performance for promise. Indeed, they seized that opportunity by the nomination of Wilson and Marshall for President and Vice President, seized it by so firm a grip that it can not be loosened, aye, either by the hosts of Republicanism or by the deluded followers who have not yet discovered that their leader's battles are waged for himself and not for the Lord; that the pretense is in the hope that thereby he will secure the Lord's hosts in support of himself for the third term, contrary to the unwritten law of his country and in defiance of his pledge once made to the people.

PRAISES NOMINEES.

The Democratic national convention seized the opportunity by a method so simple and straightforward as at once captures confidence and enthusiasm. This it did by placing in nomination for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States men whose records as governors, respectively, of the States of New Jersey and Indiana show that they know how to prepare, to devise, and to apply governmental remedies, and whose lives were so clean and righteous that the people could be assured at once that the pledges made by their party and their own promises to the people would be faithfully kept and executed.

The result has been so well received by the people that to-day even the most cautious observer does not hesitate to accept—the most cautious observer except Thomas Taggart [laughter]—does not hesitate to predict the election of Wilson and Marshall. What remains for us to do, however, is to make it so absolutely clear that it is a necessity for the people of the United States to elect this ticket that there will follow, not a bare majority, but an overwhelming majority in the electoral college for Wilson and Marshall.

GOVERNMENT BY PEOPLE.

It is only 125 years ago that a Government was launched here in the United States, the like of which the world had never seen before, with a Constitution providing for a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, through their representatives, and a Constitution within which were gathered those great principles of liberty which had cost the people in England a struggle of 500 years to secure. All over the world the students of government hailed this new experiment. From every land flocked those who loved liberty and opportunity in a government by the people, administered according to law. You have prospered. We have prospered in our intelligence. On every hillside is to be found the schoolhouse, from which have come—from many of which have come—leaders of thought in America; and all over the United States we have universities and colleges unsurpassed in the history of the world, with doors wide open to every man who is ambitious for a higher education, and with opportunity for every man, no matter how poor he may be, to secure such an education.

Not only that. Our wealth has increased. Never in the history of the world has there been so much comfort enjoyed by so many people. Our wealth to-day, coming then from a very small wealth with a handful of people, has grown to a population of more than 90,000,000 and our wealth more than double that of any other country in the world, save Great Britain and Ireland combined, and to the wealth of Great Britain and Ireland you must add the entire wealth of Russia before you equal the wealth of the United States. And yet, my fellow citizens, notwithstanding that, you and I know that there is a great feeling of unrest in the United States. Even the people who are the most prosperous and successful are dissatisfied with existing conditions, and it is the proper thing for us to-day to explore deeply into our conditions for the purpose of ascertaining the real cause.

WILSON POINTS OUT EVILS.

Our candidate for the Presidency, the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, in his masterful and exquisite speech of acceptance at Seagirt, put his finger directly and unerringly upon the source, the original source, of the evils from which we complain, wherein he treated of the partnership between Government and privilege. Go where you will, trace any existing evil of to-day back to its original source and you will find that it had its beginning in that day when, mistakenly, the representatives of the people of the United States began to try to help some people at the expense of others.

I am not here to-day to spend any particular time in speaking of the beginning, but, my fellow citizens, it began to expand. It began with the Nation and it spread on down, all the way down to the town, this partnership between Government and privilege. I shall confine myself to the partnership between Government and privilege so far as the Federal Government is concerned. If we were to cover the whole field it would take volumes in order to cover it.

Now, first, my fellow citizens, what is privilege? In the sense in which it is employed by Gov. Wilson and in the sense in which I use it to-day, it is the securing of the right to enjoy the levying of toll in some form or other upon a portion of the people or upon all of them. You can imagine what would happen if in the State of Indiana a law should be passed which permitted John Doe to have the right to collect 5 cents toll of every man that passed in front of his house. But that is practically what has been done by the Federal Government.

ROBBERY THROUGH TARIFF.

Now, we all know—and if we do not, if there are any alive who do not know, they ought soon to find it out—that there has been taken from the pockets of the people of these United States thousands of millions of dollars by means of tariff statutes and transferred them to the pockets of those whom we now speak of as enjoying swollen fortunes. There was a time when the Democratic Party in making, which it has, a consistent and persistent struggle against this form of accumulating wealth in the hands of the few at the expense of the masses—there was a time, I say, when our arguments were attempted to be met by the representatives of the Republican Party, but that time has passed. I need not detain you to-day, nor need we in this campaign detain the audiences, to discuss that fact, for it will be quite sufficient, if there are any doubters, to call their attention to the admissions of the party and its representatives, which is responsible for this condition.

We can look first to the admission in 1908, when the Republican Party for the first time in its history put in its platform a provision that there should be a special session of Congress immediately after the 4th of March following the election to consider the tariff and revise it. We have President Taft's declaration to the people of the United States then, during that campaign, that his party would bring about an honest revision of the tariff, the tendency of the duties being downward.

VETO OF TARIFF BILLS.

We have, again, the assembling of the Congress in pursuance of that promise, and we can hear to-day the denunciation of the tariff bill which was proposed, as it was made by the 13

United States Republican Senators who repudiated the infamy which was about to be perpetrated upon the people. We have the appointment of the Tariff Board in order that they might ascertain what duties should be taken off. We have only recently those Republicans in the House of Representatives and in the Senate who joined the Democrats in passing bills which reduced tariff rates, so that they passed through both Houses and passed to the President, who was compelled to veto them.

Now, my fellow citizens, we have more. We have also the acknowledgment in the confession of faith of one who was but a little while ago a Republican, and a Republican President of the United States. Is it not strange, my friends, that during all those seven and one-half years that he was President of the United States there was no power on earth that could induce him to say a single word in behalf of the relief of the people from the burdens thus imposed? But now, when he no longer relies entirely upon the old party for success——

[Here the seats back of the speaker's stand collapsed, and Mr. Parker resumed his speech after the excitement had passed.]

Our next inquiry is what party is responsible for the condition in which we find ourselves as regards the tariff, and it only requires a few sentences to dispose of it.

RATES ARE RAISED.

When the Republican Party came into power in 1861 the average rate of tariff duty was 20 per cent. It had been higher before, but in those days there was no partnership between Government and privilege, and in 1846 Congress reduced the average rates from 32 to 25. Ten or eleven years passed away and again, under Democratic leadership, the tariff rates were again reduced to an average of 20 per cent, and I venture that you will agree with my assertion that had not the Republican Party come into power there never would have been any increase in the rates, and for the reason that the census of 1860 showed that during this period of lower duties and reduction of rates there had been a greater percentage of increase in the national wealth than has occurred at any other period in our history, before or since, and that there was a greater increase in the percentage of money invested in manufactures than there has been in any period of our history, either before or since.

But the first thing almost that the Republican Party did was to advance the average rate of tariff duties from 20 to 37½ per cent. Within two years it advanced it further to 47 per cent, the excuse being that the exigencies of the Civil War required it. But now nearly 50 years have passed away since that increase on that excuse, and yet the average rate of duties is higher to-day by a small percentage than it was then. So, my fellow citizens, we find not only that they increased it, but they kept it up. We have had the Dingley bill, the McKinley bill, and last we have the Payne-Aldrich bill, and still the average rate of duties is higher than the Republican Party placed it during the war. So that we have no difficulty in finding the party that is responsible, and solely responsible. There has never been a revision by that party downward.

COMPETITION IS DESTROYED.

Now, that brings us to another subject involved in the charge that there has been a partnership between Government and privilege, and that is the combinations to restrain trade and prevent competition, called, for short, "trusts." In the very beginning of tariff discussion, long before the Republican Party came into existence, it was insisted that the effect of high duties would not be to oppress the people, because, it was argued, there will be competition between the various manufacturers, and that will keep rates down. And it was the law then in every State in this country—and we had inherited that law from England—that a combination to restrain trade, to prevent competition, is absolutely void. More than that, now and then some men got together for the purpose of securing the full benefit of these tariff duties, creating combinations in one form and another, and so an act of Congress was passed, known as the Sherman Antitrust Act, which was a criminal statute, and it was believed that now—having made combinations to restrain trade and prevent competition a criminal offense, or, in other words, a combination so that prices may be advanced to the consumer—there would be no further attempt; but, my fellow citizens, there was further effort in that direction. Just before the year 1896 there was a Democratic Attorney General by the name of Judson Harmon, and he prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States a case, in which it was determined that the Sherman Antitrust Act was workable. If there had been any effort after that to prevent the creation of combinations to restrain trade and prevent competition, we would never have had the serious situation which now confronts us; but the year 1896 saw every Democratic Northern State pass into the Republican column. On that night of the election there was not left in all the North or East or West one of the old Democratic States. Our Republican friends now had full control not only of the Federal Government but of the Northern and the Eastern and Western States and all their State governments as well.

TRUSTS TAKE ON LIFE.

And then there began to grow these combinations to restrain trade, which we now call trusts. They grew slowly at first, because they were all afraid, or perhaps some of them were afraid, that they might be pounced upon, but as year after year passed and trust after trust was created and not interfered with by the Federal Government, when the Republican State governments were absolutely supine and permitted their creation in the States, then, my fellow citizens, they began to grow more rapidly, because through this form of trusts there was an opportunity to secure practically the full benefit of the excessive tariff rates provided for by the tariff statutes.

On September 14, 1901, the number of trusts in this country had grown to 149, and the amount of capital involved in stocks and bond issues was a little less than $4,000,000,000. And now the carnival of trust building began. So far they had proceeded without opposition. There was adequate law to crush them. That law would have been enforced by the courts, as it ever had been, if the courts had been applied to. They were not applied to, and the reason was that the Federal administration and their State administrations, wherever the Republican Party had influence, was not in favor of curbing the trusts.

Seven years and a half more passed away, and the 4th day of March, 1909, arrived, and that four billions, according to the speech of Senator LA FOLLETTE last Friday in the Senate of the United States, had grown to almost thirty-two billions, and the 149 trusts, so Senator LA FOLLETTE said, had then grown so that there were 10,020 plants in combination in the United States.

HOLDS G. O. P. RESPONSIBLE.

Now, my fellow citizens, we need not talk about responsibility for that. The Republican Party is solely responsible. You ask me why it is that the Republican Party permitted this great wrong to be done—for it is a wrong, not only to all the people of the United States, but to the people who have invested their money in these securities, believing that the Government which watches over all things would not permit securities to be issued by absolutely illegal combinations. You ask me why they did it. In other words, What was the consideration? My fellow citizens, naturally all men in public place would prefer to do the bidding of the people; naturally every human being who holds public office, if he has any heart or conscience at all, would like to do what is right by the people. But this had been growing so slowly, until finally the Republican Party leaders—bosses, Col. Roosevelt now calls them, now that he wants to be the sole boss—the Republican Party leaders, looking over this situation, saw that their great support and strength was in the captains of industry, and in the vast sphere of influence which they exercise, which meant not only certain portions of the press, that were within their beck and call, but it also meant leaders of finance in every direction; and of still more importance yet, in an election, vast armies of employees, who were assured by those who were attempting to secure the benefits of tariff rates, by trusts, that their interests—in other words, their bread and butter—depended upon the success of the party which protected the industries from which they received their wages.

CAMPAIGN FUNDS AIDED.

But that is not all, my fellow citizens. They also received a goodly sum of money in every congressional and national campaign, which was paid into their treasury. Why, only Wednesday of last week, a former Republican chairman of the State of New York testified before a Senate committee that in a certain campaign his State committee for his own State alone received $700,000 in money and that $500,000 of that amount had been paid to him directly by the national committee of his party. What did they do with it? We need not stop to discuss that. I suppose that out here in Indiana you have heard what they do with surpluses of money under such circumstances, but if there is anyone who has any doubt about it, let him read the history of Adams County, Ohio, and the 40 per cent of its population who were indicted and then either pleaded guilty or were convicted of the charge of selling their votes.

My fellow citizens, so well known was this fact among the party workers, all the way down from the Nation to the town, that there was scarcely manifested a shock of surprise when it was disclosed that even a President of the United States had not hesitated to suggest to a distinguished railroad financier, in a letter which is now in existence, that they were both practical men, but also advised him that he would like to have him, a little later—after the elections were over—come down and discuss certain matters not connected with the campaign.

I pass now from this question of consideration—as time is flying—to the other question: Where are you going to get relief?

RECALLS FORMER PROMISE.

Can you expect relief from the Republican Party? From the tariff? No; you know you can not. Did not that party tell you in 1908 that it would revise the tariff?

I need not stop now to discuss what has happened since. You know, and all the people of the United States know, that the tariff was not reduced, on the average, at all. There were some rates lowered and some elevated, but altogether their friends were still taken care of. Can we trust the Republican Party to change its record with reference to that? Nor can we trust President Taft, for if he were elected President and there should go into power with him a Republican Congress they would pay no attention to him. That is what happened when the Payne-Aldrich bill was passed, you will remember. Taft then pleaded with them to keep faith with the people of the United States, but his party would not do it. His party had the power; the interests, the beneficiaries of the tariff, the trusts, demanded their pound of flesh from the Republican Party, and they received it. So, even though he should be elected and his party go into office with him in control of Congress, they would not allow him to do anything. They would sit on him just as they did before.

But aside from that, we do not feel now that he wants to do anything. Has he not vetoed every one of these bills that have been passed by a Democratic House and by a combination of Democrats and Republicans in the Senate? He presents an excuse, of course, and his excuse is that his Tariff Board knows more about it than Congress. Well, to begin with, my fellow citizens, under our Constitution, Congress is the body to revise the rates, and not a tariff board, which is not known to the Constitution.

AS TO TARIFF BOARD.

And again, my fellow citizens, I deny that this Tariff Board of President Taft possesses in any degree whatever the fund of knowledge possessed by those great Democrats, who in that Congress now for years have been studying the tariff, men who, under the leadership of Speaker CLARK and Leader UNDERWOOD, have made a record for the people and for the Democratic Party in the last two years, which, in my judgment, ought alone to win us this campaign, ought to win us the confidence of all the people of the United States.

Now, certainly there is not anybody outside of a lunatic asylum who has any idea that the creator of the Progressive Party and his own nominee for President of the United States has any intention of giving the people any relief from tariff duties. How could anyone have any such an idea? Was he not there for seven years and a half? And during that time—I call you to bear witness—not one single word did he utter in behalf of a reduction of tariff rates. Oh, he preached a plenty; he invited the attention of the good people of the United States in every direction under heaven in which nothing could be done. With a tariff statute which was bearing down heavily upon the people and under which were supported trusts—there where real financial relief could be given; there at the very fountainhead of the corruption which was slowly but surely destroying the best and highest interests of this country—did he turn their attention there? No; not one word did he utter in behalf of real relief. Certainly there is no one who is going to suggest that Col. Roosevelt, late President of the United States, would hurt the trusts at all, is there? If there is such a person, I would like to hear him.

GROWTH OF TRUSTS.

Senator LA FOLLETTE said in a speech in the Senate, where it is a part of the RECORD, that when President Roosevelt took office we had only 149 trusts, and they had less than $4,000,000,000 of capital, including railroads in combinations, but when he finished and on the day that he left the office those four billions had grown to $31,672,000,000. In other words, in capitalization, seven-eighths of the capitalization of all the trusts in the United States came into existence while he was in office. The number of trusts—again referring to Senator LA FOLLETTE'S speech—grew from 149 to 10,020. Now, my fellow citizens, if there was nothing more to be said, I would ask you whether anyone would suspect that he would do any harm to the trusts that came into existence, when you know and I know that there was an abundance of law to stop them then and there? They have found out how to stop them since. Even President Taft knows how to stop them. Why, he now only has to point a gun up the tree and they come down.

There never was any trouble about the law. We had an abundance of law, but we had no man in great station who was willing to stop them and protect the people from their assaults. There is one more word I want to say before I quit that subject. We have some evidence of consent on his part—very substantial evidence, too, my fellow citizens. You know just a little bit of truth did leak out about those records while the great battle was on between Col. Roosevelt and President Taft for the Republican nomination. It turned out that along about the 1st of November, 1907, his weak and pliant Attorney General was about to prosecute a suit against the Harvester Trust for its dissolution, and then George W. Perkins—the George W. Perkins who confiscated $50,000 out of the New York Life to help him in 1904—turned up and George persuaded him in a very few minutes to write a letter to his Attorney General, which stopped the suit, and the Harvester Trust is going yet.

STEEL MERGER DISCUSSED.

But that is not all. It only took about 20 minutes for the same Perkins and Judge Gary to persuade President Roosevelt that he ought to allow the United States Steel Corporation to swallow up its greatest rival, the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., and that is on record now. I do not hesitate to say, my fellow citizens, that in view of the fact that these trusts so multiplied without any real serious interference on his part—except with his mouth—I do not hesitate to say that it is a fair deduction from that evidence, plus the letters which I have told you about, in these two great cases, that there are others of like import, and that his Attorney General was probably restrained in more cases than these. But were not these quite enough? Was it not quite enough for any one of these men who had thus been helped, to go and tell his neighbors: "Why, you need not be afraid; press on. We have a friend at court."

My fellow citizens, I have already taken too much of your time in the discussion of these questions, and I want to close this part of my address by saying that we have not any assurance from the colonel, in his confessions of faith, that he has changed his mind about the trusts. He does not tell you now that he is going to curb them. We know he did not, and he now says that they ought to be regulated. In other words, he says to the people of the United States, who ought to be intelligent people, in view of the fact that we have schoolhouses on every hillside, that it was all right for him to sit still and allow these trusts to multiply, until, as Senator LA FOLLETTE said, there was no longer anything of importance enough to combine. He says to the people of the United States that now that these trusts have come into existence, nothing must be done about it; that this old law against combinations to restrain trade and prevent competition, which was in force in England, and still is, and is the law here still—no matter if these men have, in defiance of the law, builded up these great trusts—nothing must be done to interfere with them. The thing to do now, he says, is to regulate them.

WILLING FOR CONTROL.

I delivered an address on constitution day at the Jamestown Exposition, in which I marshaled certain facts which satisfied me that the gigantic corporate interests of this country—I do not mean those not in combination, but those in combination—were desirous of Federal regulation and control. They are quite willing to take their chances—not always, but most of the time—of running the Government the moment the proposition is established by the people that it is all right for them to be regulated. That prediction was based upon evidence that I had of the attitude of certain great financiers in this country. Since that time, as you have all read, Judge Gary and Perkins and others have gone upon the witness stand, in the investigation of the steel corporation, and have testified that they were in favor of regulation. So, my fellow citizens whatever else you may expect, whatever else the people of the United States may expect, from Col. Roosevelt if he should be President again, make no mistake about it, he will never lift his finger in the future, any more than he has in the past, to curb the trusts; and make no mistake about it, he will receive from some of them, at least, his full share of support.

There is a direction, my fellow citizens, in which the people of the United States can turn for relief. Not to the Republican Party, not to the Progressive Party, but the Democratic Party has a record of reduction of the tariff, back before the war, from 32 per cent to 25 per cent, and then to 20 per cent. There were in those days no combinations to restrain trade; there were no such things as trusts; there was no such thing as a partnership between the Government and business.

PEOPLE HAVE ASSURANCE.

Again, my fellow citizens, the people of the United States have this assurance: That we present to them the record of a Congress of the United States, a Democratic Congress, elected by the people, after the fraud of 1908 had been perpetrated upon them by the Republican Party, and with the record of that Congress we had a right to go before the people of the United States and say, "Here is the evidence of the will, the power, and the intelligence to serve the people of the United States as they ought to be served." Aye, and one thing more, fellow citizens; we have nominated for President of the United States and for Vice President men whose lives from their cradles up are an open book, men whose lives should and will convince every human being in the United States that if the great power of these two great offices be conferred upon these men they will, God helping them, serve the people as they have promised to serve them.

And now, Gov. Marshall, the great Democracy of the United States, in convention assembled at Baltimore, after nominating for the office of President of the United States that eminent Democrat and scholar, statesman, and tried public servant, Woodrow Wilson, unanimously, sir, chose you as most worthy to be his associate.

PRAISE FOR GOVERNOR.

Your nomination, sir, was made amid great enthusiasm and with full appreciation on the part of every delegate present that your ability, your character, your valued public services, made your name an addition to the ticket, so that it became perfectly symmetrical and, in our judgment, absolutely invincible.

The Democratic national convention, too, sir, selected a committee representing every State and Territory in the Union and honored me by making me its chairman, and sent us here, sir, to tender to you, in its behalf, the nomination for the great office of Vice President of the United States. Moreover, in behalf of all the people of these United States, connected at least with the Democratic Party, and many who are not, your nomination has been accepted with such great enthusiasm, such complete confidence indicated, that in their behalf, we, the members of the committee, as well as in behalf of the national convention, whose servants we are, not only tender to you the nomination, but most respectfully, sir, beg you to accept it in behalf of the party which honors and loves you as well as in behalf of the people who, in my judgment, will call upon you and your associate to serve them.

SPEECH OF GOV. MARSHALL.

Judge Parker and gentlemen of the notification committee, permit me to say that it is not my purpose on this occasion to present details. I wish merely to present some general observations clothed in homespun language in the belief that they may be of value in fixing the opinion and determining the conduct of the intelligent voter this year.

Try as we may to separate the religious from the civic, the fact yet remains that good government has in it an element of morality. Neither constitutions, nor laws, nor ordinances can completely divorce civil government from religious sentiment. There are periods in the history of a people when the conflict between the good and the bad may involve almost all of the commandments. There is rarely a conflict in which at least the one commandment against covetousness does not become an issue, and this campaign is no exception to the rule.

It will be well for the voter to clear up same hazy definitions. We have for many years been entertaining a belief, founded upon no fact whatever, that Democracy and Republicanism represent different ideas of government. The Republican has looked upon the Democrat as a man opposed to the Government. The Democrat has looked upon the Republican as a man opposed to the people's rule and in favor of aristocratic sway. It is time for us to remember that democracy is not a system of government. Indeed, democracy may find its expression in any one of numerous systems.

DEPENDS ON CITIZENS.

The rule of the people is not essentially rule by the people. By their votes, even when democracy has unfolded to full manhood suffrage, the people may have a monarchial form of government. The people's rule does not depend upon the number of votes nor necessarily upon the system of government under which they vote. Good or bad government must go back to good or bad citizenship, to intelligent or ignorant, to honest or dishonest electors. I venture the assertion that if the electoral franchise were now granted to all the citizens of Russia, the Little Father would again be crowned in Peter's city.

American democracy in its purity was intended to mean, and I believe does mean, something more than voting, something more than selecting officers. Like the sunlight, we can not see it, yet we can not see without it; and like the sunlight, it has not only bathed this Republic in a sea of beauty and glory, but it has warmed and nurtured every fruitage planted in the garden of universal brotherhood.

American democracy does not depend upon caste or creed or condition, upon race or color, upon wealth or poverty, upon success or failure; but unerringly it does depend upon the inner life of the individual citizen. It is an inspiration and an aspiration. It does not always depend upon the ticket which a man votes; it does depend always upon the motive back of the ballot.

The historic Democratic Party of America had its inspiration and its aspiration in the life and conduct of its great founder. It is time now to have a perfect concept of that democracy, for in recent years we have divided ourselves into three classes, and the classification has been made not by the heart throbs of men, but by their social condition. We have those who are immeasurably rich and who are looking for more, and we have those who are unutterably poor and who are growing poorer. Between these two extremes we have the great middle class, living well and reasonably content, except for the uncertainty of not knowing whether they are to rise into the first class or sink into the third.

DIVISIONS NOT LOGICAL.

Many have assumed that only the unutterably poor and those sinking into that class were Democrats, and that the immeasurably rich and the climbers were Republicans. But these divisions have not been logical. It was not the outward and visible which marked the inward and spiritual of Thomas Jefferson. Born of the bluest blood in the Old Dominion and accustomed, as gentleman, scholar, diplomat, and statesman, to all the luxuries of his generation, he was the man who declared that all men were created equal, and that all were endowed with certain inalienable rights, such as life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Even to his dying hour this seeming aristocrat had not a single heart throb which was not in unison with the heart throbs of his fellow men. His great opponent in statecraft sprang from a lineage so lowly as to be unknown. With none of the advantages of either fortune or family, Hamilton believed in hanging on princes' favors and in catering to the chosen few.

At its best, human nature is weak. The cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches ofttimes stifle generous impulses. Great crises are necessary to awaken many men to their sense of duty. It was because I thought a crisis to be at hand that four years ago I made the statement that 80 per cent of the people of Indiana were Democrats at heart even though they did not know it. I now enlarge that statement and declare that 80 per cent of the entire country believe in the historic democracy of Thomas Jefferson. This campaign is going to rid the Democratic Party of every man who does not believe in its principles and is going to add to the party's ranks, I hope, every man who does believe in them.

Men have allowed their personal interests, ambitions, and prejudices to sway their political conduct and consequently this great body of American citizens, thinking alike and feeling alike at heart, has never been united under one banner to fight for the common rights of common humankind. The strength of those determined to give every man his chance in life, unhampered and unaided by legislative enactment, and to strike down every species of special privilege inuring to the benefit of a few; of those like-minded in their view that government is a necessity and not a luxury, and that business should have its large opportunity for success, but that this Government was made for men, not corporations; for principles, not interests; and of those with sufficient courage and fortitude to drive the money changers from the temple of our national life, has been impoverished by desertions due to personal interests, ambitions, and prejudices.

CALLS FOR PATRIOTISM.

This campaign calls upon some for justice, upon others for charity, upon all for patriotism. It does not call for the bandying of epithets nor for an appeal to the personal. We may safely leave to that senile dementia which has seized the so-called Republican Party the personalities of this campaign. Its unfitness to rule the Republic is disclosed by its inability to keep its temper. It was cohesive so far as its leadership was concerned while it was engaged in looting the public, but even its leaders are now disorganized while quarreling over the loot. As for the party's bosses, the improper influences in American political life are about equally divided between them. Everywhere, "Boss" Barnes is crossing swords with "Boss" Flinn, and their charges and countercharges disclose greatness only when we apply Emerson's statement: "Consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds."

How comes it that we have reached such a condition in affairs in American life that the party in power is rent in twain, that boss is charging boss with knavery, crookedness, and dishonesty, and that each faction is claiming an exclusive patent upon honesty and patriotism while avowing that the success of the other would spell irreparable ruin for the public? And, more particularly, how comes this to pass under a republican system of government, consisting of coordinate branches to which were ceded by the people none of their inalienable rights, but only such powers as were thought to be needful to redress the wrongs, preserve the rights, and keep unshackled the moral, intellectual, and physical forces of mankind?

Though a majority of the people have been voting the Republican ticket and have been assuming thereby that the majority would rule, the disgraceful but purifying scenes which have been enacted recently in Republican conventions disclose that a large number of those who have been voting the Republican ticket are Democrats at heart. These scenes disclose further that we have been mistaken in some of our conclusions touching government in America. We have yielded a quiet assent to the proposition that a majority is all powerful and that a minority has no rights which a majority is bound to respect. But now we know that the theory of the historic Democratic Party, that it is the right of a majority to rule, but only within constitutional limitations and without the usurpation of a single inalienable right of a single individual, is correct.

"It is only when majorities thus rule that governmental machines move without friction. The right of a majority to thus rule must always be conceded. I wonder, however, if it has dawned upon the sober second thought of this people that it is possible for a majority to be a minority and that it is equally possible for a minority to be a majority. At first blush, it would seem that the officials elected by the plurality of votes become the representatives of the majority and that as such they rule. But I am not in error when I declare that it is not the mere number of votes which determines a majority in America, in the sense of having the power to formulate the policy, enact the legislation, and control the Government, and I point to the election of 1908 for proof. The protest of every man who voted for President Taft and who is now dissatisfied with the President's management of public affairs proves that for four years a minority has been the majority in America. At the risk of offending the sensibilities of the Republican who voted for President Taft only to be dissatisfied with his administration, I am going to tell him that he is one of the men I counted in making 80 per cent of the voters of this country members of the historic Democratic Party. His present protest against the result of his ballot reveals his belief that it is not the business of Government to grant, under the guise of taxation, to any class of citizens or to any member of society special privileges which are not granted to every other class and to every other member of society.

"The social condition which we call democracy, and which finds its avenue of expression at the polls through our party, is unalterably opposed to special privilege, whether granted by the law or seized by ruthless ambition. It is true, the mother of all special privilege is the high protective tariff. All who voted the Democratic ticket at the last presidential election were unalterably opposed to this system of unjust taxation, and a sufficient number of those who voted the Republican ticket were likewise convinced of its iniquity to make an overwhelming majority against it. Save a favored few, all were agreed that relief, to a greater or less extent, should be afforded to the people from the unjust exactions of this system. All knew that we could not educate the people of America indiscriminately, enlarge their views of life and happiness, and then, by the high cost of living, deprive them of their pleasures without making of American life a seething caldron of discontent. Theoretically speaking, therefore, the majority of votes, having put a party in power upon a platform pledged to relieve the people of these burdens, has been ruling under constitutional limitations. But this is not so. Immediately after the election the minority became the majority in the sense that it assumed control of legislation with reference to special privilege. All the members of the Democratic Party and all the protesting members of the Republican Party have been in the minority when it came to counting votes where the count fixed the cost of living. It may be said that this is a mere accident of politics, a single illustration, and that it will not occur again. But it is no accident. It is only one of many illustrations. It simply discloses the utter folly of a man remaining a member of a party when the party policy ceases to voice his inner spirit. The Republican Party does not recede now from its protective theory. Its return to power will mean again the rule of a minority and the theoretical idea of democracy will continue to be the practical aristocracy of special privilege in this country.

PLENTY OF CHOICE.

The voter who can not satisfy himself this year is indeed censorious. Eliminating the verbiage of platforms, taking their substance and viewing the candidates placed on them, the voter who believes that the cost of production at home and abroad should be equalized to the manufacturer of this country and who wants an oligarchy to rule may vote the straight Republican ticket; the voter who believes in a similar protective theory, but who prefers to an oligarchy that the President shall be the state, may vote the Progressive ticket; the voter who believes this Government should be turned into a socialism may vote the socialistic ticket; the voter who thinks that church and state are not separate in America and that the people have a right to settle religious questions and to determine by ballot what is good and what is bad may vote the Prohibition ticket; and all those who insist that it is not the business of Government to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad to the manufacturer until it equalizes the difference in the purchase price to the consumer at home and abroad, who believe that the only equalization justifiable in our Government is the equalization of opportunity, who think that public office is a public trust, who do not believe that disgruntled and defeated politicians are genuine reformers, and who think that reforms are not born with sore toes may vote the Democratic ticket.

I respectfully urge all those who are opposed to special privilege to ally themselves this year with the historic Democracy, the corner stone of whose edifice is the Declaration of Independence and the keystone of which is the golden rule. At Baltimore it proved its right to be because there it arose and by its proposed policy met the needs and wants of a people. Am I to be met with the statement that results like those of the last four years might just as well have been produced under Democratic supremacy? This I deny. The kingdom of Democracy, like the kingdom of heaven, is within us. It comes not by observation. It is a living, growing, vital principle. It is as essential to the life of the man who is a Democrat as pure air or pure blood. The power to resist lying is not in the mouth but in the heart of a man. His power to resist larceny and murder is not in his fingers. Democrats, like poets, are born, not made. They are born with the fixed and unalterable belief that God made all men, not some men; that all men are entitled to an honest chance in life, unhampered and unharmed by law or custom. We may separate in language church and state, but we can never have that social condition which we call democracy until all men living in the Republic are full, not half, brothers; until all have been baptized in the blood of the spirit of the Revolution and consecrated at every altar set up, North and South, in the War between the States.

WARNS WEALTH SEEKER.

Upon whom does this campaign call for justice? Many a man devotes himself sedulously to business not because he wants money for himself but because he believes that jewels and luxuries will make his wife happy. Sometimes, too late, he finds that which she wanted was love, not luxury. So, too, many a man in America is devoting himself to the making of money through legislatively granted privileges, not so much that he wants the money himself as that he wants to disclose the richness, greatness, and prosperity of the American Republic. Meanwhile he has not stopped to consider that while the few, through special privilege, are adding millions to the bank balances of this country the educated and impoverished many are looking down the years and seeing at the end of them nothing but an open grave in the potter's field. The spirit of democracy and his innate sense of justice call upon this man right now to stop and look and listen; to review what really makes for greatness in a people; and to answer in the silent watches of the night the accusing voice of his own conscience, which tells him that it is men, not money; brains, not business; love, not lucre; peace, not prosperity, which mark the greatness of a people. Let him answer that accusing voice by resolving that, though he may not make so many dollars in the future, he will not forget that every other man's wife and every other man's child in America are equally dear to him, and that he desecrates the graves of those who fell from Lexington to Appomattox and stamps himself a coward when he demands or receives the aid of the law in his conflict for supremacy. Too long have some been the recipients of money made through the toil of others and turned over by unequal and unjust taxing laws. It is good to love wealth and all that wealth can bring, but it is better to love the Republic more than all the trappings of outside pomp and circumstance. From this good hour let these men fight their battles of life without handicapping their less fortunate brothers. Let them hang pictures of Nathan Hale in their bedrooms, and as each day's light reveals his features unto them let them vow that as this old hero thought more of men than he did of British gold so they will dedicate their lives and consecrate their efforts to his splendid ideals.

Upon whom does the hour call for charity? There are thousands of us who have not reached the land overflowing with milk and honey. Still, we wander in the wilderness of industrial despair. Still are we able to gather manna only for a day, and still we look with longing on the fleshpots in Egypt. Discontent and bitterness have entered into our souls. So long have we been impressed with the iniquity of special privilege, with the arrogance of some rich men, with the power of money to produce peace or war, plenty or famine, that we have come to hate all those who have and to believe that the possession of money is the mark of infamy and the badge of dishonor. If you be one of these, my brother, this hour calls upon you for charity. Many have succeeded honestly in this land; most have succeeded, as they thought, honestly. There are but few who have not cared how success has come to them. Let us not condemn until the sheep have been separated from the goats. Let us understand that it is possible for the man in broadcloth and the man in hodden gray to be brethren in America. Let us await the developments of a brief time lest perchance the judgment of misfortune upon fortune may be injustice, not justice. Let us be sure before we strike; let us condemn no man unheard; and let us give to every man his advocate in the forum of American brotherhood.

EQUALITY BEFORE THE LAW.

It will be observed that the sum of the justice and the charity for which I am contending is the revival of Jefferson's idea of equality before the law, not equality in muscle or brain or will or energy, but that equality which guarantees to every honest and industrious man his life, his liberty, his happiness, and his chance. Justice and charity are always needed to enforce this guaranty. Get into the bread line if you will, but beware in so doing not to drive out a weaker brother.

I see a people, the most marvelous which has ever sprung from the loins of time and the womb of destiny. Among them are all kindreds, tribes, and tongues. What are they to become in the melting pot? They are of like passions, men with hopes, fears, ambitions, prejudices. Are they to evolve into castes, not of birth and lineage, but of success and failure? Out of the crucible of these years, heated with the fires of both seeming and real injustice, is a newer generation to be poured forth to the vassalage of the paternalistic system of government born under Republican misrule, or to a socialism where success depends not upon merit and honest endeavor, but upon the mere drawing of the breath of life?

It is idle for a thoughtful man in America, whether millionaire or pauper, to longer play the ostrich. Safety does not consist in hiding one's head in the sands of either sentiment or hope. It is foolish for the vastly rich to keep on insisting that more and more shall be added to their riches through a specious system of special legislation ostensibly enacted to run the Government, in reality enacted to loot the people. It is worse than ignorance for them to smile at the large body of intelligent Americans who regard themselves fortunate if the debit and credit accounts of life balance at the end of each year; and to assume that the mighty many, who are becoming convinced that that social system which we call democracy is but a glittering generality, will long endure the industrial slavery being produced. The hour has come when patriotism must consist in something more than eulogies upon the flag. Whether voting the ticket or not, men everywhere looking upon the awful injustice of this economic system are becoming socialistic in theory if not in conduct. And shall any fair-minded man say that if it redounds to the interests of the people of this country that a hundred men should control its business to the good of everyone, that there is anything fallacious in the theory that government, instead of transferring business to a favored few for the benefit of all, should itself discharge that business for the benefit of all? I have never been able to convince myself that either system would not cast a pall over human action and dull the motives which have heretofore moved mankind to the very loftiest endeavor and produced what I conceive to be the most perfect system of government ever devised by the brain of man since that far-off theocracy of the Jews went down beneath the demand for the pomp and splendor of earthly power. And yet I do not hesitate to say that if it be impossible to restore this Republic to its ancient ideals, which I do not believe, and I must make the ultimate choice between the paternalism of the few and the socialism of the many, count me and my house with the throbbing heart of humanity.

THREE GRADES OF CITIZENSHIP.

The discontent in Republican ranks is Democratic discontent. How much of it has reached the point where, wearied with the bad workings of a good system, it is willing to topple that system over and try something new, I can not prophesy. But I am quite sure that whatever badges men may wear in America this year, whatever ballots they may cast, and whatever battle cries they may utter, there are but three grades of citizens. The first grade is made up of the favored few, their hangers-on, and their beneficiaries, who think the eagle is upon the dollar, not as an emblem of liberty but as an emblem of power, and who look upon government as an annex to their business affairs; these are they who in the past years of Republican misrule have turned the temple of constitutional freedom into a money changers' mart and have made of the coordinate branches of government obeisant lackeys of the jingling guinea.

The second grade consists of those whose outlook upon life has been enlarged by the civilization under which we live, who have been taught by the school and the college, by the press and the magazine, who appreciate and enjoy the good things of life, whose horizon has been enlarged and whose capacity for joy and sorrow has been increased. Year after year they have seen the boundless resources of the richest country the sun ever shone upon pass into the control of the favored few. They have observed that the laws have been enacted, construed, and enforced so that, struggle as they will and act as they may, they see before them naught but long years of servitude and certain poverty at the end. Conditions have become unbearable to them. They hesitate to hope for reform, so often has it been promised to them and so often has it been denied. They have reached the point where, in the struggle for that which they believe to be right, they are willing to destroy the ideals of the Republic. How many there are of these I do not know, but I do know that special privilege in the Republic is breeding them day by day like rabbits in a warren.

The third grade of citizens it pleases me to call old-fashioned constitutional Democrats. These are they who believe that the equality of mankind does not consist in an equality of brain and brawn, but in an equality whereby every man, native and foreign born, has an inalienable right to exercise all of his ability in getting on in the world, just so he realizes that in getting on he owes it to himself, to his family, and to the Republic to see to it that he gets on honestly and that he does not prevent any other man from obtaining the reward of his honesty and enterprise. These old-fashioned Democrats believe in making money, but they believe that every dollar made should be so clean that an infant may cut its teeth upon it. They hold that it is no part of government to boost one man and to boot another, and that any system of government which enables one man to take advantage of another is not a system under which a democratic condition of life can thrive. They hold that from age to age social and economic conditions change, but that the great principle of the equality of all men before the law can never change while time shall last and that the honest interpretation of this great principle in statutory enactment, judicial construction, and executive conduct will take from the life of a people the mighty avarice of the few, bind up the broken hearts of the many, and loose the bonds of all who are in slavery to wrong, injustice, and ignorance.

SYSTEM IS NOT WRONG.

The individualism of Thomas Jefferson is not dead. It has not moldered back to dust in the grave at Monticello. It walks the earth this day knocking at the door of rich and poor, of wise and ignorant, alike, calling upon all men to make this age the millennium of statecraft, wherein no one shall claim to be the master and all shall be glad to be the servants of the Republic.

It can not be that it is the system of government which is wrong. It is the unjust use of the system. From Jefferson to Lincoln the Republic grew in might, in majesty, in pomp and splendor, and the humblest of its citizens could obtain justice, not as a beggar crawling in the sun, but as a man. It has not been the use but the misuse of the powers of government which has produced this discontent in the minds of men.

The historic Democratic Party moves forward, now as always, true to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, loyal to the Constitution, and confident that if men will be imbued with the spirit of these two documents and will guide their public and private life by the concepts of righteousness therein contained, peace and plenty will bless their homes and come as a benison to every weary, downtrodden, and oppressed soul.

The contending forces in America are as they are in nature. There is a centripetal force which is ever drawing the earth toward the sun. There is a centrifugal force which is ever drawing it away. These two contending forces, acting each upon the other, have kept this old world of ours safely in its orbit, and springtime and harvest have not failed. Should either force become superior, desolation and destruction only could result. The centripetal force would draw the earth into the sun and make it but fuel for the warmth of other planets. The centrifugal force would send it whirling out of its orbit to the northern pole of stellar spaces. There are times in July when we long for the North Pole and there are times in January when we pray to be nearer the sun. But our sober second thought convinces us that the middle course is the safe course for the world.

The contending forces of political life are commonly denominated reactionary and revolutionary. They are the paternalistic forces of the Republican Party which would draw our Government out of its orbit and consume it in the fiery heat of the lust and greed of the favored few, and the socialistic forces which would draw it away from its constitutional conception of three coordinate branches and from its guaranty to each individual of an opportunity to assert his natural and acquired talents in an honest endeavor to succeed. The historic Democratic Party, of which I am an humble member, stands between these contending forces and believes that some harvests for humanity may be garnered by proceeding in the old orbit which the fathers founded, by meeting in the old way each generation of men as they shall rise, by never forgetting that this Government was founded not for business nor success nor for incompetency and for failure, but to guarantee in lawful ways the opportunity of every man for liberty and for the pursuit of happiness. Old principles applied in new ways will convince these two extremes of thought that our historic party can make exist what now is but a name—Democracy under a representative form of government.

CALLS FOR BROTHERHOOD.

If I doubted that the return of the historic Democratic Party to power would fail to right the wrongs of industrial life, to wipe out the injustices of legislation, and to preserve the opportunity of every man for happiness, then my voice, now weak, would be silent. If I did not believe that, in so far as human agency can, this party of ours will promote the brotherhood of mankind, I would here and now repudiate it. But believing, as I do, that the Republic had its origin in an inspiration which did not come from the mere brain of a mere man, but sprang from the heart of humanity; believing that this age more than any which has preceded it calls for conscience and brotherhood in governmental affairs; hoping that every sacrifice of mind and body and personal good which has been made is a guaranty of the perpetuity of this, the latest and greatest experiment upon the part of a democracy to work out its ideals in government; and trusting that the God of Washington, the founder, and of Lincoln, the preserver, will still be the God of the Republic and will not permit his chosen people to wander forever in the wilderness of legislative sin, I accept, upon its platform, the nomination of the Democratic Party for Vice President of the United States. And may my right hand forget her cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if in all my gettings I fail to get that greatest gift—wisdom and understanding to know the heartbreak and the need of our common humanity.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I also ask that the speeches be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

LIMITATION OF FEDERAL INJUNCTIONS (S. DOC. NO. 944).

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have a copy of a hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, on the bill (H. R. 23635) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911. I ask that the paper be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PEARL HARBOR TRACTION CO., HAWAII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7377) granting a right of way through the Fort Shafter Military Reservation, Territory of Hawaii, to the Pearl Harbor Traction Co. (Ltd.), and for other purposes, which was, on page 1, line 10, after the letter "a," to insert the word "revocable."

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the request of the House for the appointment of conferees, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. BOURNE, and Mr. CULBERSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

An act to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

H. R. 23604. An act for the relief of Frank D. Courtade was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JUDICIAL PROCEDURE.

Mr. ROOT. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 16461) to regulate the judicial procedure of the courts of the United States (S. Rept. 1066). I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 16461) to regulate the judicial procedure of the courts of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 269 of the act approved March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 269. That no judgment, decree, or order shall be set aside, or reversed, or new trial granted, by any court of the United States in any case, civil or criminal, on account of any error which does not injuriously affect the substantial rights of the party complaining. The trial judge may, in his discretion, in any case submit to the jury the issues of fact arising upon the pleadings, reserving any question of law arising in the case for subsequent argument and decision, and he and any court to which the case shall thereafter be taken on writ of error shall have the power to direct judgment to be entered either upon the verdict or upon the point reserved, if conclusive, as its judgment upon such point may require."

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. ROOT. I hope the Senator from Idaho will not insist on that. This is practically the identical bill which has already been reported from the Judiciary Committee after long consideration. It has been up here three or four times as the subject of discussion, many suggestions have been adopted, and the House bill as now presented is reported with a recommendation of amendments to make it identical with the Senate bill. So it is the result of great consideration and is the reconciliation of, I think, all the differing views on the part of members of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. The questions involved received consideration for two or three years by a committee having charge of the matter. It was thought then to interject into the procedure of the United States courts what to me seemed to be within the class of modern doctrines to overturn the practice of a century, to create an innovation, taking from the judges judicial power. I am somewhat jealous of any provision or proposition to take from the judges the judicial power to do that which belongs strictly within that class. I do not object to modifications of practice; I do not object so much to a change in the manner of procedure, although I am very slow to concede it; but whenever it strikes at the power of what a judge may do or changes or attempts to control the rule of judicial power, I must be shown.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. We considered all those questions during the time that we were revising the judicial code.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know whether I have the floor or the Senator from New York has it. If I have the floor, I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. WORKS. I hardly expected to have the Senator from New York suspected of any modern innovations in judicial matters. I rose to inquire of the Senator from New York what changes are made by this proposed amendment of the section. I can not tell by the reading.

Mr. ROOT. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I will answer the Senator from California. This bill is the residuum of a bill prepared and presented by the American Bar Association, considered at a number of successive meetings of that association, and under discussion by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate for a number of years. It is all that is left of a much broader bill, and it aims to do two things. One is to provide that a judgment or decree shall not be reversed for error which does not do a substantial injury to the complaining party. It is to establish for all the courts of the United States the rule that the best judges of the United States now follow—not to reverse a judgment for merely technical errors that do no injury. The other is to permit a judge upon a trial where there is a difficult question of law to submit to the jury questions of fact, so that they may be determined and judgment may be rendered in accordance with the facts when the question of law has been decided, whichever way it is decided. Those two things are what this bill aims to accomplish.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not opposed to modern innovations if they are calculated to further the interests of justice; and if the Senator from New York correctly states the objects, the purposes, and the effects of these amendments, as I have no doubt he does very clearly, I am certainly not opposed to the amendments. I think they are in the furtherance and for the advancement of the proper administration of justice. For that reason I approve of them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the existing section of the statute is as follows:

SEC. 269. All of the said courts shall have power to grant new trials, in cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law.

That is the existing law, and that has been the law for a hundred years or more. Under that, having the power, our judiciary has administered the law of appeal or new trial without any embarrassment. There have in recent years come before the courts a class or classes of cases in which there was something more than the straight—what shall I say?—principles of law involved, where there was political sentimentality involved, and where there were involved modern ideas, that the hands of the courts in some way should be tied or controlled. It has never met with a responsive echo in my mind. I was trained in rather a strict jurisdiction. I studied law in one of the most conservative States in the Union under the common-law procedure. I never took kindly to the code. I have, of course, adapted myself to it throughout a practice of many years, but I have always been on the alert against new methods in the administration of justice under the organic law of our land.

The power of the judge of the United States court is defined by the Constitution; we can not change it. It is not competent for Congress to undertake to limit judicial power, and all of these are attempts by indirection to do that thing—to limit judicial power. Judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is vested in any court that we create. We can not create a court in which judicial power is not vested by the act of creation of the court. We invest the court with judicial power and then undertake to say that that power shall be limited. There is no limit to judicial power, but there are rules governing the exercise of judicial power.

Mr. President, let us for a moment investigate the proposition contained in this amendment. I will again call attention to the basis of the legislation. It is only three lines.

SEC. 269. All of the said courts shall have power to grant new trials, in cases where there has been a trial by jury—for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law.

That is only a reiteration of the constitutional mandate. Upon what conditions?

There is a clear recognition of the record of the jurisprudence of the country. That is an appeal to it; that is a declaration of stability in the judiciary. We have only to appeal to the cases in which the courts have acted in order to know what was the rule heretofore existing. We go to the decisions of the court under existing law. Here the legislative branch undertakes to disregard precedent and to establish statutory grounds upon which the court may act.

The American Bar Association appeared before the committee, through its representatives, on many occasions, and they gave us the benefit of a vast amount of correspondence in regard to this question. I have felt at all times that it was a sacred duty to stand between existing law and established precedent and the innovation that rises in the mind of man to-day and passes out to-morrow, only to be substituted by temporary views of somebody to follow him. In the courts and in this body, the Congress of the United States, I have stood, and I hope always to stand, for stability of action. The danger of to-day is the drifting away from the stability of the law in its enactment or in its application. All of this populistic, sensational sentiment that we hear preached and see written grows out of yielding by men who should not yield. The instinct resulting from the carefully trained and carefully guarded legal mind is against innovation either in the making of law or in the administration of it through the courts.

Mr. President, this proposes very radical changes in the law as it has existed for over a century. The free and unembarrassed right of the court is expressed in existing law. This attempts to place a limitation upon it. It reads:

That no judgment, decree, or order shall be set aside or reversed or new trial granted by any court of the United States in any civil case on account of any error which does not injuriously affect the substantial rights of the party complaining.

Mr. President, heretofore the parties have been permitted to have some voice in determining what were their "substantial rights." Under the provisions of this amendment that matter is to be left to the judges, many in number, varying in intellectual caliber and inclination. One judge would say "that affects a substantial right of these litigants"; another would say, "I do not think that it does," or he would act upon his own judgment; and you would have in one court a new trial granted where in another court under exactly similar circumstances it would be refused. It is not in the interest of uniformity of either procedure or decision, and it is in violation of the rule of stability of the law. I think it is quite serious.

When the matter was urged upon the Committee on the Revision of the Laws by the American Bar Association's representatives, they thought there was a unanimity in the mind of the committee upon this question—a complete agreement. I do not know now that there is not. I know that the committee, composed of Members of both Houses of Congress, rejected any such proposition and stood by the old principle which they wrote into the revision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not want the statement of the Senator from Idaho to go unchallenged as broadly as it is made. I was a member of that committee. I was then in favor, and have always been in favor, of the principle contained in this bill; but I acquiesced in the existing statutory law. We had very early determined that we would not make substantial changes in the law, but would only revise the existing law. So far, however, as the principle is concerned, I am in most hearty sympathy with it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understood my colleague asked that the bill go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I was appealed to to give consideration to the question, which, under the rules of the Senate, or, rather, under the methods of procedure in the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet had an opportunity to ask if there was objection to the present consideration of the bill. The Chair will now ask if there is objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Unless it may be discussed, there is objection. I do not anticipate a prolonged discussion; but, with the views I entertain, I can not sit supinely by and allow a matter of this kind to go, merely for convenience in point of time.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to interfere with the passage of the bill, but I thought that my colleague had objected to its consideration; and, therefore, if that was true, I wanted the regular order; if not, I am perfectly willing that we shall go ahead if there is unanimous consent to take up the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, then, that I will discuss my objection to it under the consideration of the bill. I will not object to the consideration of the bill; but I will take occasion to express my views here, as I have always insisted on expressing them, when this matter is up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that the bill be given consideration at this time?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 16461) to regulate the judicial procedure of the courts of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have read the first section of the proposed amendment, and I will now read the second:

The trial judge may, in his discretion, in any civil case submit to the jury in connection with the general verdict specific issues of fact arising upon the pleadings and evidence, and he and any court to which the case shall thereafter be taken on writ of error shall have the power to direct judgment to be entered either upon the verdict or upon the special findings, if conclusive, upon the merits.

We do that now in cases on the equity side of the United States courts. That is quite a familiar practice with us. Where controversies arise over subjects matter not convenient to the court—and in a large country that frequently happens—we submit questions of fact to the jury, and they very often go on the ground and examine mines and premises, where the controverted questions of fact are presented. Then the court may either disregard those findings and enter a judgment upon matters directly before it or it may accept the findings and render the judgment upon them. That is the equity rule now. We have equity rules that provide for the administration of the law by the courts along those lines. It is proposed now to extend this to actions at law, and it gives the trial judge, in his discretion, in any civil suit the power to submit to the jury, in connection with the general verdict, specific issues of fact arising upon the pleadings and evidence. Of course, all the facts arise upon the pleadings; evidence arises upon the pleadings; if it does not, then it is not properly considered. I notice some changes in this bill, and I assume they were made in committee, for they are lead-pencil changes.

Mr. ROOT. Those changes are to make the bill conform to the Senate bill as reported by the Senate committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that is not objected to. It proceeds and says:

And he—

That is, the judge—

and any court to which the case shall thereafter be taken on writ of error shall have the power to direct judgment to be entered either upon the verdict or upon the specific findings.

I have no doubt at all that the committee considered and weighed that provision in the light of the constitutional provision guaranteeing the right of trial by jury. Of course, this creates an alternative that might in some cases conflict with that guaranty of constitutional right, because we must remember that we are on the law side of the court, and the constitutional provision refers only to the law side of the court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield to the Senator in a moment when I have finished my thought.

The Constitution guarantees the right of trial by jury unmodified and unrestricted. This bill gives the court the right to disregard that kind of a jury trial and to enter a verdict upon another proceeding in an action at law; and I am rather wondering what consideration the Judiciary Committee gave to the harmonizing of this provision with that guaranteeing the right of trial by jury. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the provision in the Federal Constitution providing for the right of trial by jury is the same as the provision in most of the State constitutions, the same as it is in the constitution of the Senator's own State. It is very usual in the legislation of a State to provide for a special verdict and for a finding by the jury upon special facts, and then a direction to the court to enter a judgment either upon the general verdict or upon the special verdict.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is in equity cases.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no; it is——

Mr. HEYBURN. It is with us.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is done repeatedly in personal-injury cases. A question is submitted to the jury whether or not the plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence, for example.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is statutory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly, it is statutory.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have a provision of that kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly; and that is what I am directing the attention of the Senator to, that notwithstanding the provision of the constitution of his State guaranteeing the right of trial by jury the statute of his State provides precisely as we propose to provide here.

Mr. HEYBURN. It provides that the parties may stipulate to do it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. At the discretion of the court special interrogatories may be submitted to the jury. There is no requirement of the Constitution that the jury shall render a general verdict. It may be a general verdict or a special verdict, and the judgment follows upon the verdict as a matter of law.

Mr HEYBURN. There seems yet to be confusion in the consideration of the two classes of trials provided—one in which the jury specifies the judgment; the other in which the jury finds a fact, leaving the determination of the judgment to the court. The constitutional provision insuring a jury trial belongs to the first class. The second class is advisory to the court and the court takes the liberty either to accept the exact conclusion of the jury or to modify it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When the jury returns a special verdict it simply finds——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not a jury trial under the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes. It simply finds the ultimate facts, and from the ultimate facts the conclusion of law naturally flows.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, I must differ with my colleague. That is not the kind of jury trial referred to in the constitutional provision. That is not a determination of the rights of the parties by a jury. The constitutional provision was intended to protect the parties in having their rights determined by a jury and not by the judge. That was the purpose of the restriction, and you can not consider under the same class the special proceeding in which the jury merely finds a fact without undertaking to determine the rights of the parties, leaving it to the court to determine them.

That question received a great deal of attention, and I have no doubt that my conclusion is sustained or borne out not only by that consideration, but by the decisions of the courts. The courts have considered very thoroughly the difference between a jury trial that determines the rights of the parties, which binds the court, and proceedings by a jury that do not bind the court. The whole question, when that provision of the Constitution was under consideration and when it has been since under consideration, was whether or not the protection intended to be given by it was against the court's variation from the judgment of the jury. In other words, it was intended to make the finding of the jury binding upon the court as distinguished from advisory to the court.

Mr. MASSEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MASSEY. Do I understand from the Senator's statement that questions of fact in a proceeding is equity under the Federal procedure are to be determined by a jury, or can be determined by a jury under the provisions of the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. This bill does not affect at all proceedings in equity. It does not profess to, but is confined to actions at law. As a matter of fact, under the equity rules governing in our United States courts, the court may submit special facts to be found by a jury, and it does it constantly. I happen to know that they do it as well in the State of Nevada in United States courts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The verdict is not conclusive.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the verdict is not conclusive. I have in my mind a case of very great importance, involving a mine of great value, in which the court entered a decree, and never even referred to the fact that it had been referred to a jury for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not certain conditions existed; and upon having his attention called to it he said it was not obligatory upon him even to refer to it; that he disregarded it because he did not approve of it.

Mr. MASSEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MASSEY. I desire to state that in nearly all jurisdictions, if I am correctly informed as to the law, in proceedings in equity the verdict of the jury upon facts where such verdict is authorized is wholly advisory and may be disregarded by the court or chancellor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in thorough accord with the Senator on that proposition.

Mr. MASSEY. And I also desire to say to the Senator that I seriously doubt whether a provision of law allowing questions of fact to be submitted to a jury in a Federal court, in view of the provision of the Federal Constitution, would not be in conflict with the Federal Constitution and in direct opposition to the Constitution so far as concerns the equity powers of the court at the time of its adoption. I also understand that there rests in Congress the power, so far as actions at law are concerned, to determine the procedure—by what method or means those questions of fact may be determined—of course, ultimately vesting in the court the right to determine whether or not the verdict of the jury is right or wrong.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would like to have the particular attention of the Senator, because that is a point that I considered before he entered the Chamber. I have taken and am still inclined to take the position that Congress may control the procedure, but not the power, and in express terms this measure undertakes to deal with the power of the court, the judicial power. Now, that vests under the Constitution and not under Congress. It does not vest by virtue of the creation of the court or legislation, but under the Constitution, and the Senator from Nevada has very properly suggested the line of distinction. If this undertook only to regulate procedure, I could not and would not attempt to raise this objection to it; but it undertakes to define and limit the power, the judicial power, and therein, in my judgment, it is beyond the power of Congress to enact such a law. It does not leave it in doubt. The language is explicit. It says that no judgment, decree, or order shall be set aside. Now, that is a question of the exercise of judicial power. That is not procedure; that is not method; that is the power to do a thing. It shall not "be set aside or reversed."

Mr. MASSEY. Will the Senator permit me again?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MASSEY. I ask him if the courts of the Union—Federal and State—are not and have not generally applied the same rule with respect to decisions upon motions to set aside or appeal that as in the bill in so far as the actions at law are concerned?

Mr. HEYBURN. The courts have the right to establish and follow their precedents, and the courts now say, "We will not do this"; but they do not say it by virtue of any restriction placed upon their action by Congress or in recognition of any power of Congress to do it. The courts themselves may do it.

Mr. MASSEY. Will the Senator permit me again——

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. MASSEY. To suggest that the power of the court to determine any right involved, being substantial or merely technical right, is still vested in the court, and the court is not deprived in the exercise of that power by the bill before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. They undertake to deprive them of it, but I agree with the Senator that that power is vested in the court. The court is the sole custodian of the power under which it exists and acts, but there is a vast difference between the court exercising that power or controlling it and Congress undertaking to do it, and under the terms of this bill Congress undertakes to control the exercise of the judicial power, and there is no word in the Constitution that gives Congress any authority for such action. And bear in mind that I keep the distinction always before me between courts of law and equity. We are dealing with the only kind of courts mentioned in the Constitution. Those are courts of law. The Constitution nowhere mentions courts of equity, and this bill does not undertake to deal with anything other than courts of law.

Now, Mr. President, I revert to that. I was reading:

The trial judge may, in his discretion, in any civil case—

Of course that means an action at law—

submit to the jury in connection with the general verdict—

What? Something that qualifies the verdict. Now, the Constitution says that the litigant is entitled to the verdict of the jury, and there is no judicial power that can take it away. The limitation upon the judicial power of the courts at law is in the Constitution, but it is not vested in Congress. Now, you are proposing here to merge a power that is constitutional with one that is not. You are proposing to merge the functions of a court of law with those of a court of equity. I have known the attempt to be made. I have had some rather serious controversies in resisting such attempts, but I have never known a court that sustained the other view; that is, a court of last resort.

There are special actions, statutory actions, actions that would not exist in the absence of a statute. This does not deal with those or with that class of actions. This deals only with the constitutional court, and we must not confuse decisions and judgments of courts of last resort as applied to special actions with those that are strictly common-law actions.

In special actions Congress has provided and may provide for the exercise of a mixed jurisdiction and manner of procedure, but we are not dealing with that. This refers directly to the class of courts mentioned and referred to in the Constitution.

I would not contend that in special actions created for the determination of a peculiar class of cases Congress might not exercise a control approaching that undertaken to be exercised here. But inasmuch as this refers to section 269—and section 269 refers only to the courts of law mentioned in the Constitution—we must avoid the confusion and we must not base any argument or listen with attention to any argument based upon consideration of conditions that exist in relation to special actions, the creation of statute, or of equitable actions which grow out of any statute. If the action grows out of any statute, of course it is not a proper subject for consideration by a court of equity, a court sitting as a court of equity. That court had its origin because of the fact that the law by reason of its universality had no remedy to propose and it was incapable of proposing any remedy. It originated at the king's gate, by the inability, perhaps, of the unlettered and uncouth attendant there to sift the people who went in to see the king to plead for that for which the law, by reason of its universality, had made no provision. By and by the king found it necessary to have a trained man to do the sifting in an intelligent manner, and he provided a seat for him to sit on, and by and by he covered it with a crimson cloth, and by and by they placed a wool sack on it, and then you had the first chancellor of England. But that is not this case. This statute does not refer, even remotely, to that jurisdiction.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask the Senator whether he does not think that great progress has been made since the early days to which he refers, when the beginnings of equity grew out of the necessities for change and modification of the severe rules of law? It seems to me that necessarily our system of law, using that term in the broadest sense, to include both common law and equity, has been a progressive development; and if the lawyers, the men who are charged with maintaining rights, asserting the sanctity and authority of law, are unwilling to permit that development to go on, laws become discredited; they lose their authority; the ministers of the law come into disgrace, and the necessities of justice sweep away the laws that stand in the way of justice.

This, Mr. President, it seems to me, is one of those steps, not a very long one, but one of those steps which in the fullness of time ought now to be taken in order that the administration of our law, following the natural course of immemorial development, may keep pace with the requirements of our people and their need for justice.

I do not want to interrupt the Senator, although there are some other things I should like to say.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am glad to be interrupted, and I am glad to have the benefit of the very excellent suggestions of the Senator from New York. I think that this belongs to a class of questions about which we might differ in detail but in the essential we would agree.

Mr. ROOT. Then let me say something further. The Senator from Idaho, responding to an impulse with which I sympathize, to resist sentimental changes in the law, has questioned the wisdom of this provision, but I want to say to him that this is not a matter of political sentiment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. ROOT. It so happens, sir, that the bar of my own State, my own people at home, have seen fit to put me in the position of president of the association of the bar of my own city and then as president of the association of the bar of my own State. In those capacities I have been required to attend and be present at all the discussions of those great associations of lawyers during a considerable series of years, and a large part of those discussions has been upon subjects which have gradually led to the evolution of just this provision and of accompanying provisions which were in the bill originally as presented by the American Bar Association, but which have been laid aside because they met too much opposition, and it was desirable to secure the enactment of matters in which there seemed to be very general agreement.

Now, upon these two provisions there has been agreement of very able and experienced and conservative lawyers of the American Bar Association. I know that there has been agreement among the lawyers of my own State as the result of long and thorough discussion. There has been agreement of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives; there has been agreement of the House of Representatives; there has been agreement of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate; and it seems to me that that general agreement of those most conservative of men, the lawyers of the country, upon the wisdom and the value of this step in development may well be accepted by the Senate as indicating that this is not a sudden burst of political sentiment.

These two provisions have a common purpose. As our national life becomes more complicated, as our laws multiply, as the rules of action which control the courts and the laws which have to be applied by the courts increase in number and complexity it becomes more and more difficult for judges to avoid slight errors. There are some branches of the law in which it is almost impossible in a long trial to proceed without some error.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me there?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in thorough sympathy as a practitioner with this action of the court, which is almost universal in disregarding them, but I am not in sympathy with Congress dipping into the matter and saying that they shall do it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, we by law impose upon the courts limitations. We set up statutory provisions which they are expected to apply. We constrain them in their action. What we are to do by this provision is to say to them, You are not to consider that we constrain you to do injustice. You are not to consider that we constrain you by our statutes to reverse a judgment upon technical grounds in which no injury has been done. The effect of it is to declare, by authority of law, the rule of conformity of all our laws to the rule of justice and to relieve the courts from the fancied obligation which many judges consider to be imposed upon them to regard the letter of the law even though injustice may be done by regarding it.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may interrupt the Senator, there we will meet with the same difficulty when the judges are confronted with the proposition of determining whether or not the errors are material errors.

Mr. ROOT. There is the proper exercise of judicial power. We say to them, although in the hurry and confusion and rush of the trial you find the letter of the law may have been contravened, we declare to you that it is not our purpose that the letter of the law shall work injustice and that you shall reverse a judgment unless substantial injury has been done.

Mr. HEYBURN. But that is outside of our power.

Mr. ROOT. That does not prevent the exercise of judicial power.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where do we get authority to say that is not our purpose? We do not create the power of the court.

Mr. ROOT. We create the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. We do not create the power of the court.

Mr. ROOT. No; we do not. But we declare what the purpose of the lawmaking power is, and we declare that it is not our purpose that our laws shall be used to do injustice upon technical grounds.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not within our province. We can not declare the purpose of a law that will bind the courts.

Mr. ROOT. We certainly can declare the purpose of a law.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not binding on the courts.

Mr. ROOT. It will certainly be regarded by the courts.

Mr. HEYBURN. It might be taken, of course, as a matter of inducement or argument.

Mr. ROOT. Now, let me say one other thing. Both these provisions are designed to remedy a very real injustice, I say, not as a matter of theory, but as a matter of practical observation at the bar, and I say it as expressing the consensus of testimony by many experienced lawyers. That practical injustice comes from the necessity of going back over and over and over again for new trials, because there have been errors which did not really affect the merits in the original trial, or because there have been errors which when the facts, when the merits are really ascertained, were of no consequence. The effect of that evil is chiefly against the honest man of modest means.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Excuse me one minute. I have known cases to be tried and go up on appeal and be reversed and sent back and tried again and go up and be reversed and sent back and tried again and be reversed and sent back and come back for the fourth time to be tried. The result is that only the very rich can afford litigation, and the ordinary honest man of moderate means had better suffer injustice and refrain from prosecuting his rights in the courts.

Both these provisions are designed to obviate that serious difficulty which is bringing the administration of the law and the courts and the bar into disrepute among the plain, honest people of the country, who do not see how such things can be permitted consistently with honesty and good faith. For the credit of my profession, for the credit of this body which is charged with making laws that shall do justice, I hope the Senate of the United States will not be the one body which shall stand against this beneficent step in the development of our law in the interest of justice, the one body remaining in the United States that refuses to hear anything from the world that is less than 100 years old.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not seen the amendments. I understand there are some amendments reported to the bill. I notice that the bill as it passed the House includes criminal cases as well as civil.

Mr. ROOT. That has been stricken out in deference to the objections of Members of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with all the Senator from New York has said, and if it were possible to emphasize it, I should like to do so; but I ask the Senator from New York if he does not think the same objection to our present procedure and the frequent reversal of cases, time after time, upon barren technicalities is as much of an evil in the enforcement of criminal law as it is in the administration of the civil laws, and if the bill as it passed the House, including both civil and criminal procedure, is not a more complete remedy of the evils he speaks of than it would be if limited only to civil cases.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I answer the Senator from Washington that I fully agree that the same evil exists in criminal cases, and the same rule ought to be applied. We have a statute in my own State, which has now been in operation for a considerable number of years, and which applies this rule in substantially these words to criminal cases, and the bar there, doubtful as many of the old conservative members were when the statute was passed, have now, I think, become fully reconciled to it; it works admirably. I should like to see the same rule put into the Federal Statutes.

We struck out criminal cases because of serious objection on the part of a number of Members of the Senate. I wanted to get the law through as far as we could get it through and trust to the future for the consideration of the matters that had to be jettisoned in order to secure passage.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree, of course, with the Senator that if we can not obtain complete relief it is a great deal better to take what we can get. I know what the Senator's views are as to that particular matter. The breaking down almost of the administration of the criminal law has come to be one of the most conspicuous subjects of criticism of our institutions. We are constantly hearing comparisons of the great length of time it takes in this country to try even an ordinary criminal case as compared with the expedition—and expedition without the sacrifice of justice in any degree whatever, according to the defendant every constitutional right that is included in our Constitution—that prevails elsewhere, proceeding with the trials in a common-sense and businesslike way. When the cases are disposed of by a jury and by a judge and substantial justice has been accorded they should not be reopened and protracted until the evidence is dissipated and the witnesses are dead, and the most flagrant criminals, in many instances, go unwhipped of justice.

In conclusion, I merely wish to say that I regard this measure, which is advocated so forcibly by the Senator from New York, as one of the most important measures that has been dealt with by Congress at the present session, and either limited, as it is, or with the criminal procedure included I should like very much to see it passed.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to add but one word more following what the Senator from Washington has said. As an incident to these frequent trials and retrials, the sending back and back of the cases for trial, I have known cases in which the parties changed their evidence every time the case was tried to meet the decision of the appellate tribunal. They get a new trial and the evidence conforms to the opinion of the court, and another new trial and the evidence conforms again. It is making a game of litigation instead of the simple ascertainment of facts and the application of the law. It is, as we must concede, though it be to our humiliation, to tangle justice in the net of form. This bill is one small step toward creating a situation in which a plain and honest citizen who thinks he has rights can get them instead of being tied up and hindered and delayed until he is wearied and impoverished and abandons his rights.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am in accord with very much that has been said by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I am not discussing the broad question as to whether the existing law and the existing methods result in speedy and prompt determination of controversies. I have had as much experience as any Member of this body in the trial of cases. I have been at it all my life, both in trial courts and in the appellate courts. I know of the vicissitudes of trial; I know of the resorts of those who are interested in litigation. I have had it before me. But I have thought it necessary in life to stand at attention and on guard whenever a change was proposed in the law. I sat as chairman of the judiciary committee in the constitutional convention that made our constitution, and it was one continual resistance to innovations; nothing that was right.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I can sympathize with the Senator from Idaho because I happened to land against a similar condition as the chairman of the judiciary committee of the convention which made the New York constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator then knows with what conditions you are confronted, and not only there, but I have had to stand in a miners' meeting where there was no law within reach, and to perform the same duty, keep the curb upon the impulses of men to disregard established methods and principles of justice. I have seen them rush forward to seize a man's property because of what they thought the law should be, or to take his life because of what they thought the law should be.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. We have been discussing this matter about an hour. I do not think the measure is before the Senate at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unanimous consent has been given for its consideration.

Mr. BORAH. No one knows what the bill contains. There is a bill here with some amendments which have not been read and of which most of the Senate is wholly uninformed. We ought to at least have the bill read with the amendments, so that we may know what it is.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill has been read.

Mr. BORAH. It was read at a time when it was under objection, and nobody paid any attention to it. I will ask the Senator from New York to state what are the amendments? We have a bill here that we are informed is not the bill upon which we are to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be read.

Mr. BORAH. I would just as soon the Senator from New York would explain the amendments. That is all I ask him to do.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the bill read in full.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for any purpose necessary to bring it before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the text of the bill has been read, but that the amendments have not yet been stated. If there be no objection, the bill will be read as it would stand if the amendments were adopted.

The Secretary read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 269 of the act approved March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 269. That no judgment, decree, or order shall be set aside, or reversed, or new trial granted, by any court of the United States in any civil case, on account of any error which does not injuriously affect the substantial rights of the party complaining. The trial judge may, in his discretion, in any civil case, submit to the jury in connection with the general verdict specific issues of fact arising upon the pleadings and evidence, and he and any court to which the case shall thereafter be taken on writ of error shall have the power to direct judgment to be entered either upon the verdict or upon the special findings, if conclusive, upon the merits."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Is what has just been read the original bill or the bill as proposed to be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the bill as it will read if amended as recommended by the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not endeavoring to prolong this discussion, but I regard this as a matter of so much more importance than anything that is being detained by its consideration that I have no apology to make at all. When you are proposing to change the judiciary system of the United States, you are engaged in a very serious occupation. Perhaps laymen, who have not given attention to such questions, might not appreciate the gravity of that statement, but those accustomed to dealing with organic law and applying it to methods of legislation and administration realize that when you enter upon a change of organic law all of the law from that time on must be changed to conform to it and all of the methods must be adapted to it. Therefore I feel that no apology is due from me for occupying the attention of the Senate, because I am not only occupying the attention of Members of the Senate, but I am making a record by which the action of the Senate may in the future be interpreted and judged.

Mr. President, the jury system is one that was always dear to the English-speaking people, and this is an infringement upon the right of trial by jury. I give due credit and due weight to the consideration that has been given this matter by the American Bar Association and by distinguished lawyers, but I rank in both classes. I am a member of the American Bar Association and have with great pleasure attended its meetings, where the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] presided and where he has spoken, and I have been so associated in my active practice as to entitle me to express views upon this question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has just stated that he thought, if I understood him, that this was an interference with the right of trial by jury.

Mr. HEYBURN. It modifies it beyond any question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, what does the Senator find in the Constitution which in any manner forbids a special verdict?

Mr. HEYBURN. It depends on the nature of the action.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In a law action?

Mr. HEYBURN. The right of trial by jury means a verdict by the jury. The only possible conclusion of a jury trial is a verdict by the jury, and this proposes to substitute for that, at the option of the judge—which adds to the objection—a finding of facts upon which the judge shall render the verdict.

Mr. ROOT. Would the Senator from Idaho say that the direction of a verdict was depriving a man of a jury trial when the pleadings and the testimony justified it, or would he say that there was no such thing known to the common law as a judgment non obstante veredicto?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to answer the Senator's questions in order.

Mr. ROOT. Or would the Senator say that it would be a violation of constitutional right for a judge to charge a jury that, if they find a particular fact so and so, they must render a verdict for the plaintiff or for the defendant?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is only instructing the jury as to the law of the case, and a judgment non obstante is merely saying that, aside from any facts upon the pleadings or admitted facts, the party is entitled to judgment under the law. That is no infringement upon the right of trial by jury at all; but the instructed verdict has always been obnoxious, both to the bar and to the people, and the courts have been constantly on the defense to justify such instructions, and the courts of last resort have generally frowned them down. The verdict rendered under the instructions of the court is presumed always to be the same as a judgment non obstante, because it is based upon the same principle. The court says to the jury, "It matters not what the facts are, you are relieved from the performance of your functions." In the absence of any facts or in the presence of any facts the parties are entitled to a verdict either under the law or the admitted facts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Some little time ago I suggested to the Senator, and the Senator agreed with me, as I understood, that the constitutional provision with reference to trial by jury in most of the States was the same as in the Federal Constitution, but that, notwithstanding that, it had been provided by State legislation that the court might require from a jury a special verdict in addition to the general verdict.

Mr. HEYBURN. Because they have nearly all abolished the distinction between law and equity.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the language of the constitution in the Senator's own State is substantially that of the Federal Constitution, that "the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." Of course, that means the right of trial by jury as at common law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That has been held time and time again, both under the State constitutions and under the Federal Constitution. Notwithstanding that these statutes have been passed under which the court may require from the jury answers to specific interrogatories. It is a very common practice, as the Senator from Idaho knows, in personal-injury cases that the jury, in addition to returning its general verdict of damages or no damages or no cause of action, will be required to answer the specific interrogatories, "Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence; did he assume the risk?" and so on. Upon the coming in of the verdict it very often transpires that the special findings of the jury upon these special interrogatories utterly conflict with their general verdict in favor of one side or the other, and the court, under the statute, enters judgment upon the special verdict, because the jury has found the ultimate facts, and the court may pass its judgment upon those ultimate facts found by the jury, just as the court could enter a judgment upon the uncontradicted facts, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, or, as it was known at common law, non obstante veredicto. Does the Senator think that those statutes were in violation of the State constitutions?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator has conceded that which I have been contending was the effect and purpose of this proposed legislation, to modify the right and effect of trial by jury. I am not going to be led into a discussion of the State statutes nor constitutional provisions nor the decisions or action of the courts under them, because that is a wide field, and as varying as there are States. The State courts have not been uniform in their interpretation of that class of statutes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, some of us over here are very greatly interested in what the Senator is saying, but we can not hear it because his back is to us.

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg pardon. I will try to face the entire body.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. If in order, Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to propose, and which I will propose, with the permission of the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would prefer that the Senator would withhold it. I will be through in a short time, and I would prefer to have the bill as it is for the purpose of discussing it, inasmuch as I have started out on that line.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; I will withhold the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will not say I suspected—because that would not be the proper word—but I anticipated that the effort sought by this legislation was to conform the practice in United States courts to the practice in the State courts under the statutory and constitutional provisions referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. My objection arose out of my anticipation that that was the purpose of it. I do not regard a provision in a State constitution as belonging to the same class or character of organic law as a provision in the Constitution of the United States. I believe that the provisions of the Constitution of the United States should be held more sacred against the mind of changing opinion than is necessary to hold in the case of a State constitution. I have always thought so. Many State constitutions amount, with their provisions for amendment, only to statutes, and they are changed as readily as are statutes. I am partially in sympathy with the more lax system prevailing in the State courts, more than I would be with such systems being introduced in the United States courts.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and so much has transpired since he said it that it is not so clear in my mind as I should like it to be—the Senator from New York has spoken of the necessity for this change. If he were discussing provisions confined to a State, I would agree with him perhaps; but any modification of the right of trial by jury instantly and naturally creates an antagonism in my mind. When I use the term "trial by jury," I mean the finding of a jury that is binding upon the judge, subject only to such control as the judge may under existing law exercise over that verdict. That a judge should have the option of taking the verdict of the jury as binding, or, in the alternative, drawing his own conclusion from a statement of facts, is intolerable. It gives the judge the power to disregard the right of the citizen to a trial by jury. The finding of facts is not a trial by jury, any more than is listening to the argument of counsel, or any more than is listening to the charge of the judge. The trial by jury is summed up in the verdict of the jury. Nothing is trial by jury except the verdict of the jury. That which precedes is only the process of trial, the progress of the trial, but the thing referred to in the Constitution of the United States is not the process or the progress of the trial; it is the verdict of the jury.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What the Senator has just said is so pregnant with truth and so expresses the full purpose of this bill, that I feel impelled to ask a question at this point. The Senator says that trial by jury is summed up in the verdict of the jury. Of course, the object of trial by jury is to get the judgment of the jury, and any system of jurisprudence which——

Mr. HEYBURN. The verdict of the jury—it is not a judgment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, call it a verdict; I call it a judgment in a broad sense, but it makes no difference whether you call it a judgment or call it a verdict. I understand, of course, that it is a verdict in the law. Any system which tends to preserve and protect that verdict, except in cases where some substantial injustice has been done——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is equity.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Any system, let me repeat, which tends to preserve and protect the verdict of a jury from interference by a judge, except in cases where some substantial injustice has been done, tends to preserve jury trial and the right of trial by jury, does it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I thought I would catch the attention of the Senator; that is what I am arguing for.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That being true, I should like to call the Senator's attention to this provision of the bill:

That no judgment, decree, or order shall be set aside, or reversed, or new trial granted by any court of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not discussing that part of the measure. I am discussing the second part.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that what he has just said illustrates the contention that this bill is in the interest of trial by jury and the preservation of trial by jury and prevents judges setting aside the verdicts of juries on immaterial technicalities or errors, as they are called.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like the close attention of the Senator so that he may distinguish between the two distinct and separate provisions in this proposed measure; one of which deals with one subject, and the other of which deals with an entirely different subject. I will ask the special attention of the Senator from Washington, because he has asked a question——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not yield for the introduction of an amendment now.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I will yield for a moment.

Mr. ASHURST. I have listened to the Senator's discussion of the bill, and I believe the Senate would be further enlightened if the Senator would discuss the matter in the light of the amendment which I desire to offer at this time. I ask that it be read at the desk for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the amendment will be read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for that purpose. However, I do not want to broaden the question by the presentation of an amendment of which I do not know anything.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is a good amendment, I think.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end:

Provided, however, That no judge of any United States court sitting in the trial of a case, shall be permitted to express an opinion before the jury, on the facts in any case on trial.

Mr. HEYBURN. Have we not now a statute that covers that or is equivalent to it? We have a rule in our court.

Mr. President, it is sometimes difficult in a matter so seldom presented to the mind of this body to secure an accurate, and know that you have secured an accurate, understanding of the point in issue. My objection is based entirely upon the proposition that this modifies, limits jury trials, and if I am right in that then the Senate is up to the proposition whether or not it is ready to place a limitation upon the right of trial by jury in civil actions. The question of the method of trial in criminal cases is not involved. It was in the House bill, but has been stricken out.

Therefore I will ask the Senator from Washington to give me his attention, because he has raised the question, and it is only proper that I should direct my remarks to his attention. The Senator has undertaken to defend the provision which gives the judge the option of entering judgment upon the verdict or of disregarding the verdict in entering the judgment upon a state of facts in a civil action. I would like to know whether or not the Senator from Washington stands ready to advocate that doctrine—that the judge may disregard the verdict and enter a verdict of his own upon a finding of fact by a jury.

It is not the normal function of the fury to find as to facts. It is the normal function of the jury to listen to the facts and render a verdict, the verdict being the important function to be performed by the jury, and when the jury has rendered a verdict it is binding upon the judge.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In answer to the Senator's question I will give the very reason I have advocated this bill. I understand there are a number of amendments to the bill; I have not examined all of them; but I suppose these amendments will undoubtedly of course be submitted separately. The general effect of this bill is to prevent judges and appellate courts from interfering, upon immaterial error, with the verdicts of juries or the judgments of courts based upon verdicts of juries.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, will the Senator permit me right here, because if he gets beyond that point my reply may not seem to be applicable. That is not the principal point involved in this bill, and it is not the one to which I attach much importance, because that is one the courts should always control.

Mr. BORAH. The proposition to which the Senator from Washington has referred is covered completely by the sentence down to the word "complaining" in that paragraph, and from there on it is a different subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. An entirely different subject matter. But the subject matter referred to by the Senator from Washington is entirely covered, and I think that is a matter of which everybody should be in favor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand, as I stated in the beginning, that there are a number of amendments to the bill which have not yet been presented and have not been considered.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but I think they are all here now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know that they have been read by the Clerk separately.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me? The only objection I raise to the first paragraph, down to the word "complaining," was embodied in the expression of a doubt as to whether or not it was enforceable. We can not interfere with the judicial power invested in the court. We may think we can, and we may legislate upon the subject, but the court is at liberty to disregard it. How would you enforce that first provision? The court would say that it was the sole judge of the question whether or not——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. As to whether or not these errors, if they found them to be errors, injuriously affected the rights of parties.

Mr. BORAH. We have that statute in our State, as the Senator will recall, and our supreme court has a number of times referred to it; but on a great many occasions they adopted the same rule without the statute at all. Of course, it rests at last for the court to decide whether or not it is substantial error.

Mr. HEYBURN. Our Supreme Court, with a similar provision, has held that it being the judge of the materiality of error, there was no tribunal to control it, and the difficulty would arise in enforcing it. It may be a good doctrine to enunciate; it may be good advice to the court. Much legislation performs no other function than that of giving good advice to the citizen or the court. I am not spending time on it. I say this for the benefit of the Senator from Washington, and I am devoting my attention entirely to the second portion of the amendment which undertakes to modify the right of trial by jury.

No lawyer will contend that when you give the judge the option of rendering judgment upon a verdict or rendering it upon facts found, you have given the judge the option of disregarding the trial by jury, because the trial by jury is summed up in the verdict. Nothing that stops short of a verdict is a trial by jury. I do not need to call attention to the decisions sustaining that doctrine by the courts and especially by the Supreme Court of the United States. They have held time and again that nothing is a trial by jury that stops short of a verdict. They have held it in determining the question between appeal and writ of error, which classifies upon the basis whether or not it was a jury trial.

Mr. President, when you go out to the people of the United States with a proposition to tamper with, modify, or control the verdict of a jury, you will stir up some resentment, and the provisions of this bill do modify the right of trial by jury, because it gives the judge the option to disregard the verdict and enter judgment not in conformity with the verdict.

Of course it is probable that the Senate is going to pass this bill as amended and send it back to the House, but when they pass it I propose that it will carry the brand with it. The courts are too prone to take advantage of any additional authority that may seem to be conferred upon them. That is human nature. I charge them with nothing of a corrupt motive. When you say to a court "the right of trial by jury, guaranteed by the Constitution, has been so modified that you can substitute your judgment for the verdict of the jury," you have made a pretty big breach in the wall the building of which started at Runnymede. And I feel it a solemn duty to admonish Members of Congress and to advise the people of the country what is proposed to be done.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. Under every rule of practice that I know anything about in this country, the judge now has power to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant a new trial.

Mr. HEYBURN. For error.

Mr. WORKS. For error or for reasons sufficient to him, whatever they may be.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, a conscientious judge does not act under that second classification.

Mr. WORKS. No; and a conscientious judge would not act improperly under this provision. It gives him no new or additional authority, so far as control of the verdict of the jury is concerned.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there seems to have grown up in this country, among some people and in some sections and under some interests, the fear of jury trial. I have heard men occupying judicial position speak lightly of jury trials. Perhaps in the vanity of their minds they felt that all matters affecting human kind should be vested in them for determination.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. I hope the Senator from Idaho does not refer to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly I do not refer to the Senator from California, for I have no such feeling as that, I am sure. I am speaking, on the authority of the newspapers, of the agitators—of such as spoke last night in this city in the interest of a man who claims to be a reformer, because he is admitted to be a wrecker.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I have no sympathy with any effort to destroy or limit the power vested in the jury under our system, and I hope the Senator does not suppose that I have any such views.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope it will not be necessary for me to again disclaim any suggestion that I had the Senator from California in mind. There is nothing upon which to base it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. ROOT. With reference to the remarks the Senator has just made about the jury trials, I desire to suggest that this bill is a bill in effect—is a bill in substance—to make the verdict of juries effective. It is a bill to prevent verdicts of juries from being nullified upon technical grounds.

Mr. HEYBURN. I concede that that may be the purpose in the minds of Senators, but I can not concede that that will be the result of the measure.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to suggest that as I understand the first clause of the bill, that was the effect of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that is the first clause of it.

I will acquit the first clause of being either intended or liable to result in disturbing the great principle of jury trial, but as I have already said, I am dealing with the second paragraph, which authorizes the judge to disregard the verdict of the jury and enter a judgment, not after judgment. A judgment non obstante comes at a time not contemplated by this bill and would be out of order at any other time.

The use of the word "he" in line 3, page 2, is very significant. After providing for the trial judge and for the exercise of his discretion it says:

> And he—

Now, that is the trial judge—

> and he and any court to which the case shall thereafter be taken on writ of error shall have the power to direct judgment to be entered either upon the verdict or upon the special findings.

That gives him a dual power under such circumstances, in cases where the nisi prius judge constitutes a part of the appellate tribunal. That would apply to States and it would apply to Territories. We have a Territory. We created one at the present session of Congress. Some of us had hoped that the supply of Territories was exhausted, but we have created a new one.

Mr. President, it is in the interest of preserving in its fullest measure the integrity of the right of a trial by jury that I have occupied the time of the Senate.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. At the request of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before that is granted——

Mr. NELSON. We have had no morning business transacted to-day.

Mr. THORNTON. No; we have not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to know, as a matter of inquiry, what the effect of that is? Would this bill, then, still be before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill now under consideration falls at the hour of 1 o'clock.

Mr. REED. It has already fallen, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

Mr. REED. I do not make any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, one moment before we pass on that. I desire to ask where we would be on the calendar. I wish to suggest that we have a special order that is put back on the calendar to-day, providing that bill No. 3 be considered immediately after the unfinished business, so that displacing the unfinished business I suggest would bring up at once Senate bill No. 3.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is really not disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. Not yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. Temporarily laying it aside, is the bill known as Senator PAGE's bill the order before the Senate? When the unfinished business was laid aside temporarily before, Senate bill No. 3 at once came before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont on that occasion addressed himself to Senate bill No. 3, but it was not before the Senate. The unfinished business was before the Senate during the time he discussed that bill. The Chair is constrained to rule that that order does not become operative under existing conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there was objection made to laying aside the unfinished business; that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] addressed himself to the unfinished business, and that is what was before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. The bill that was recently before the Senate came up on reports of committees. There was no idea that reports of committees would be dispensed with to-day, and on that idea objection was not made at the time to the consideration of that bill. My colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia], who is a member of the Committee on Commerce, has been called from the Senate. He had two reports to make from the Committee on Commerce, and I now ask unanimous consent that I may submit on his behalf these two reports, because it was under the call of reports of committees that the bill came up which has occupied the entire morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question in a little different form. It is that the unfinished business having been laid aside, unanimous consent be given for the transaction of morning business. Is there objection?

Mr. THORNTON. I did not hear the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is that morning business be now entertained.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to unanimous consent for that purpose if it is simply for morning business, but if there is anything going to lead to debate and to consume the time like we have been doing I will object. If it is understood that there is to be no debate, I do not object.

Mr. SMOOT. That will not displace the unfinished business, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. After having made this statement I will not object, but I object to any debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

BIG SANDY RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. SWANSON. I am authorized by my colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], to report from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. 7410) to authorize the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway to construct bridges across Big Sandy River and the branches thereof in the States of Virginia and Kentucky (S. Rept. 1068), and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANSON. Also, on behalf of my colleague, from the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 7411) to authorize the Clinchfield Northern Railway, of Kentucky, to construct bridges across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof in the States of Kentucky and Virginia (S. Rept. 1067), and I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE AT SAN JUAN, P. R.

Mr. NELSON. Yesterday the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] reported from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 26114) to authorize the Government of Porto Rico to construct a bridge across the Cano de Martin Pena, an estuary of the harbor of San Juan, P. R. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Res. 360) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of August, 1912, on the day of adjournment of the present session, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 360. Joint resolution to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of August, 1912, on the day of adjournment of the present session was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 360) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of August, 1912, on the day of adjournment of the present session, to report it back favorably without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of August, 1912, on the day of adjournment of the present session; and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized to pay, on that day, to Members and Delegates their allowances for clerk hire for the month of August, notwithstanding said Members and Delegates may not have designated by name their clerks for and during the month of August.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOIL SURVEY OF CADDO PARISH, LA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (No. 38) of the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed 2,000 additional copies of the Soil Survey of Caddo Parish, La., for the use of the House document room.

O. Howard and W. F. Fiske, of which 3,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, to be distributed through the Senate document room, and 6,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the House document room.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 25,000 copies of the majority and minority reports of the committee authorized under House resolution 148, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, and other acts, be printed, 10,000 for the use of the House and 15,000 for the House document room.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to call up Senate resolution 386, submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and I ask for its consideration by the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I am very glad that the Senator from Washington has finally acquiesced in permitting the resolution to come up. I had intended to bring it up when other Senators were in the Chamber, but I am willing to have it come up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 386.

Mr. BORAH. Is that morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire if there is further morning business. If there is it can be presented. [After a pause.] If there is no further morning business, the Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PENROSE on the 22d instant as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the statement made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, in the Senate on Wednesday, August 21, 1912, be, and is hereby, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, appointed under Senate resolution 79, agreed to on April 29, 1912.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate fully into all statements and questions of fact referred to in the statement of personal privilege made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, on the floor of the Senate, August 21, 1912; and further, said committee is authorized and directed to investigate into and ascertain the amount of money expended by or on behalf of any candidate seeking the nomination of any political party formed or in the process of formation for President during the year 1912, or by any committee or person acting for or on behalf of such candidate, or in the interest of such candidate or party; and to ascertain the names of all persons, firms or corporations contributing to any of the purposes aforesaid, and the amounts paid or contributed, and how and when paid, including all sums of money used to secure the election of delegates to any national convention or to influence the actions of delegates at said convention.

Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, and to hold sessions at such place or places as may be deemed most convenient for the purposes of the inquiry; to employ stenographers and such other clerical force as may be deemed necessary; to subpœna witnesses, send for persons, books, records, and papers; and to administer oaths.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator from Washington and the Senator offering the resolution have agreed as to the terms of it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have two amendments that I desire to present.

Mr. BORAH. I have not any objection to those amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. I wish simply to state that I have no agreement with the Senator from Washington. I had intended calling up the resolution myself, as is customary in this body, and I did not know that the Senator from Washington had been converted to a desire to have the resolution considered before the adjournment of Congress. But I make no point on that. I am glad it has been brought before the Senate, and I hope the Senate will consent to its consideration.

Mr. BORAH. What I desire to understand is not the relationship between the two Senators, but whether it is going to lead to debate upon the amendments. I understand the Senator from Washington has certain amendments, of which I am in favor, but I want to know whether there has been an understanding that those amendments are satisfactory to the original mover of the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no idea what the amendments are, and I can not tell whether they are satisfactory until I hear them read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STONE. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution which has just been read. Does the Senator desire to have it read again?

Mr. STONE. I simply desired to know what is before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary question. This is a resolution which was introduced the other day under the schedule of morning business. It went over under the rule. It seems to me that it comes up automatically as a part of the morning business, at the conclusion of the other business, and that it is to be proceeded with.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota is correct. The resolution went over under the rule and was printed, and the Chair is of opinion that it is competent for any Senator to call it up.

Mr. NELSON. As morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As morning business.

Mr. BORAH. Unanimous consent is not necessary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. BORAH. I understood that the Senator from Missouri was addressing a question to me.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho whether it is his intention now to call up the bill establishing the department of labor.

Mr. BORAH. That is my intention, if I can get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think this matter will require only a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I was addressing the Chair when I was interrupted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not observe the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to say I am not opposing the resolution. I simply wanted to know the probable time it would take, but as it comes up of necessity, of course I have no control over it.

Mr. STONE. I am not opposing the resolution, but I should like to say that if the resolution is to be debated and lead to political controversy, involving a lot of political folderol, it seems to me it would be in a measure a waste of time. I do not care anything about it, but I am very much interested in the bill the Senator from Idaho has in charge. I do not think the time of the Senate would be well taken in entering into a political acrimonious discussion here and delay the consideration of a measure of real importance. I am in favor of going on with that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the words "nineteen hundred and twelve," insert:

And all correspondence and financial transactions between John D. Archbold and Members of Congress and the United States Senate from the year 1900 to the date of the investigation provided for herein.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "employ," in the eighteenth line on the second page, insert the words "an attorney."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be read so as to show the context.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will say that it simply authorizes the committee, if they see fit to do so, in conducting this investigation, in addition to a stenographer, to employ the services of an attorney to conduct the examination of witnesses. If in these hearings a witness is simply called to the stand and makes a statement without cross-examination, without the evidence being followed up, the examination amounts to nothing. The only investigations that I am aware of which have resulted in discovering the facts in the cases to anybody's satisfaction have been those in which an attorney was employed.

Mr. PENROSE. I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to amend the resolution so as to include Mr. George W. Perkins with Mr. Archbold in the correspondence to be produced relative to campaign matters in 1904 and correspondence with Members of Congress and ex-Presidents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, after the word "Archbold," insert the words "and George W. Perkins," and after the word "Senate" insert the words "and ex-Presidents of the United States."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So as to read?

The SECRETARY. So as to read—

And all correspondence and financial transactions between John D. Archbold, George W. Perkins, and Members of Congress and the United States Senate and ex-Presidents of the United States from the year 1900 to the date of the investigations provided for herein.

Mr. PENROSE. My attention has been called to what is a very proper criticism. It is that as there is only one living ex-President—and we are not interested in the correspondence of dead ex-Presidents—I substitute the words "Mr. Theodore Roosevelt." I believe "Colonel" is his official title. I should like to have that substituted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be stated.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not care much about this matter, but as I caught the reading of one of the amendments it provides for the employment of attorneys. Am I correct about that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. An attorney—one attorney.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not understand that. I want to amend the resolution, then, so that each side shall be represented by attorneys.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is proper, Mr. President. I do not object.

Mr. STONE. Of course it is proper that each side should be represented by attorneys if we are to have attorneys.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to add the word "reputable" before "attorneys."

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Chair whether this proposition, involving an expenditure of perhaps a large amount to be drawn out of the contingent fund of the Senate, can be adopted under the rules of the Senate without a reference to and a report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is competent when no mention is made in the resolution of an appropriation from the contingent fund, and there is no such mention in the resolution.

Mr. STONE. How would the fees be paid?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair may be permitted, he will suggest probably by a future appropriation.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand, there is an appropriation; that this resolution is amending the resolution under which the committee is now acting.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if in that appropriation attorneys' fees were provided for?

Mr. PENROSE. I think the expenses were to come out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true. The cost of the investigation is to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. But did the resolution authorize the employment of attorneys?

Mr. PENROSE. No; it did not.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, there is no provision made for paying attorneys employed under this amendment to that resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. No; they would have to pay their own expenses and feel that they were serving their country in so doing. I do not believe there is any provision authorizing the payment of attorneys.

Mr. SMOOT. The Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate is composed of some of the best attorneys in this body. As far as one Member of the Senate is concerned, I would be perfectly content with the investigation by the members of that committee rather than have any attorney employed and afterwards perhaps have some claim brought in here for the services of an attorney. I believe that the amendment offered should be defeated by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is a still further objection to it. There are a number of different conflicting interests that will be investigated by the committee, and attorneys are likely to occupy positions of sympathy either with one side or the other. There are different interests involved, and it does not seem to me practical that one attorney should represent the committee in this investigation. The only fair way to do it is to let each interest employ its own attorney. I do not believe the Senate understood the amendment, if it has been adopted, employing an attorney. I think the fair thing to do is to let the various interests employ their own attorneys. It is not a situation where the employment of one attorney would cover the case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not suppose the Senator from Georgia would be of the opinion that if the interests that were being investigated had attorneys and there were no other attorneys but their attorneys the committee would be very apt to ascertain the full facts in the case. If anybody interested in the investigation should desire to conceal the facts or to prevent a full investigation, they having an attorney and the committee having no attorney, it would not be conducive to ascertaining the truth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator, if there are any conflicting interests involved, will not each one of the interests have its own attorneys, and would not the natural result be that the attorneys of the one interest would investigate and find out all they could about the other, and vice versa?

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. This discussion, like a great many others, after all, summed down amounts to nothing. It does not direct any employment of attorneys, but simply authorizes the employment of attorneys by the committee. I can assure Senators who may be interested in the matter of expenditures that the authorization will not add anything to the expenses to be paid out of the contingent fund or any other fund.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So far as the amendment is concerned, I will say, it only authorizes the committee to employ an attorney for the purposes of the investigation. I do not think the Senate or the committee is concerned in whether the parties who come before the committee have attorneys. That is a private matter in which they alone are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, there is an issue as to what took place in Chicago. There are two sides to that issue. It seems to me if one attorney is employed two ought to be employed—one who desires to expose any misconduct, if there was any, on the part of the advocates of the candidate for a third term, and one who desires to expose any improprieties, if there were any, of those who secured the nomination of President Taft. It is inconceivable to me that the same man would be suited to press both of those investigations. There are other interests involved. One would be the improper use of money by one candidate; another the improper use of money by another candidate. Lawyers are human, and I do not conceive of the possibility of one attorney being employed who would not necessarily drift into the attitude of partisanship with reference to the investigations. It is not simply the investigation of one matter, but it is the investigation of and concerns improper conduct by Democrats, improper conduct by the Taft Republicans, and improper conduct by the advocates of the candidate for the third term.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not the Senator from Georgia think that the committee representing the Senate would be endeavoring to find out the facts, regardless of who might be affected by the facts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Frankly, I believe that is scarcely human; I do not believe it is reasonable to expect an extreme partisan of Col. Roosevelt to hunt, and believe that there is an occasion to hunt, for any charge against him. I would hate very much to be called on to hunt for anything against Gov. Wilson; I would not like to be put in that position; and I am applying no harsher terms to those representing the other side than I would apply to myself. It would be an impossible position, and that is why——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Georgia pardon an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Gladly.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator assume that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is such an intense partisan of Col. Roosevelt that he would go out of his way in order to make the pathway easier?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all; but I am pointing out the impossibility of employing simply one attorney to investigate this matter, and to do it properly. I am not speaking of the committee. There are men on the committee representing each faction.

Mr. CLAPP. That is the point exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But when you undertake to select one attorney to conduct all three of the investigations, I doubt whether you would find any able attorney who is not a partisan of one of the three.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, Mr. President, I have already assured the Senator—if he listened—and I think I voiced the sentiment of the committee——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I listened.

Mr. CLAPP. That so long as the resolution simply authorizes, and does not direct, the employment of attorneys, there will be no attorneys employed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand the chairman of the committee does not want an attorney; and I do not think the Senate understood that it was voting to allow one. I was simply undertaking to point out the fact that it was not an occasion for the employment simply of one attorney. If attorneys should be employed, then the partisans of the respective sides on the committee ought each to select an attorney to represent their side, providing the committee wanted them.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator in that respect is absolutely correct. If the Senate directed the employment of an attorney, I would not accept further service as chairman without the authority to employ an attorney at least in the three respective divisions of sentiment on this question. If the Senate directed such employment, then I would favor the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say, Mr. President, that in not one word I uttered did I mean to question that the chairman of the committee is as fair as any man could be.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I am pressing the proposition that human nature would unfit one attorney to represent all three of these sides.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, did I understand the chairman of the committee to say that if permission simply was given to employ an attorney, that permission would not be used?

Mr. CLAPP. I think I can safely speak for the committee that with simply authority to employ an attorney the committee would not employ an attorney. The committee to-day consists of what we may all recognize as three divisions of political thought, each of which is represented on the committee; and there is no earthly occasion for any attorney. Consequently, if the resolution simply authorizes an attorney, I hardly think—I have not conferred with the committee—that any member of the committee would be in favor of employing an attorney. It is to be an investigation made by the committee. On the other hand, if attorneys were to be employed, the remarks of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] are eminently to the point—that there ought to be at least three attorneys.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there is one thing about the discussion of this proposition that I do not like, and that is the assumption that any committee of this Senate, and especially this particular committee, will not proceed to do its duty; that men who are appointed on a committee of investigation are assumed to have been appointed not for the purpose of determining the facts, of determining the things which the resolution sets out they shall determine, but are appointed for the purpose of obtaining some partisan advantage and to defeat the very object of the Senate. In other words, it seems to be assumed that the investigation is to be for political purposes rather than for the good of the Government. I have no patience with this notion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Michigan did not understand me to intend any such suggestion?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I am not saying that any Senator intends it, but I am simply saying that the arguments thus far seem to indicate that there will be a partisan, unfair, improper investigation made into a great question of this kind. The matter submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is serious not alone because it affects the honor and reputation of a distinguished American citizen, a political committee, and a great party, but because it goes to the very foundation of parties generally, and it should be investigated, if investigated at all, fairly, fully, and judicially.

When I think of the personnel of the committee, when I understand who constitute that committee, it seems to me that it is improper for the Senate to seek to employ some one outside to assist in the conduct of this case, and thus imply that a senatorial investigating committee is going to act in a political, partisan manner.

I assume that any man who is investigated will present his case through an attorney; he will come to the committee, and that committee will proceed to the investigation of every charge that is presented. As I understand, every member of that investigating committee, with one possible exception, is a lawyer. The experience of other Senators may be different from mine, but in all of the committees that I have been on, whenever the investigation of any question has come up there has been no lack of cross-examination, but Senators have shown themselves entirely capable of probing into the most minute details for the purpose of bringing forth the facts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a word. In the first place I want to disclaim, of course, any intention of reflecting on the committee. The Senator from Michigan could have no higher opinion of the committee than I have. So far as the suggestion that they should be authorized to employ an attorney, the mere form of the resolution leaving it to their discretion whether they should or should not, forecloses any suggestion of any reflection on the committee; but I should like to ask the Senator if, in his experience as an investigator—impartial, of course—to which he has referred, the attitude of the committee is the attitude of a cross-examiner of a witness; if the necessity for cross-examination if it is to be effective in following up evidence, of pressing witnesses, and developing clues of the evidence—if it is not somewhat inconsistent with the attitude of impartiality which the committee has to assume?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can see nothing inconsistent in presuming that a committee of the Senate, called to do a particular thing, will proceed to do that thing; and, especially, when you give an authority to subpœna witnesses, to sit anywhere, and to proceed to any length for the purpose of acquiring the evidence that is necessary to establish the truth or falsity of the statements which are made.

I have risen at this time because I did not feel that I could longer sit here and not at least protest against the idea that seems to maintain in Congress, to the effect that when committees are appointed to probe some particular thing, they are going to be governed by partisan influences. I protest against that idea. I think, if this matter ought to be investigated, the committee should be given a free hand, as it is contemplated in the resolution, and then it should proceed to make the investigation uninfluenced by any desire other than to get at the truth and to present that naked, uncolored truth to the Senate and to the country. No Senator should participate as a member in the work of an investigation of the kind proposed here who does not feel deeply the responsibility which rests upon him and who does not realize that in a great measure his ability, his integrity, and his character will be determined by the kind of report he makes upon the facts disclosed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to inquire what is the matter to be investigated? It seems to be assumed that there is some matter with which the Senate of the United States is particularly concerned that needs to be investigated. I sat here impatiently a day or two since and listened to hours of indiscriminate attack, vituperation, and abuse of men and parties.

Mr. President, are we to concede that there was a duty impelling those who attacked men and parties and that they were engaged in the performance of that duty when they occupied the time of this body on the day before yesterday and a part of the day before that? Can any Senator specify that duty, locate it, give it a name? Men who are not in a position to reply or to defend against attack were held up before this body and before the country as being unworthy of the respect due citizens of the United States.

It was intimated and charged that they were guilty of criminal practices. Their voice has not been heard, nor has the voice of any Senator been heard in defense of those men. I can not rest under that silence.

Theodore Roosevelt is not any longer the President of the United States, nor is he a fit and appropriate subject for attack upon the floor of the United States Senate. During the time that it is charged men were seeking to corrupt the political fountain in his behalf he was President of the United States, and he was subject to be charged with malfeasance or disreputable conduct only in the tribunal provided by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, it can not be said that, because he is again a candidate for office, it is proper in this tribunal to assassinate his character while he was President of the United States. If men knew, or thought they knew, of aught against him when he held that high office it was both their privilege and their duty then to call him to account.

It does not, in my judgment, justify an attack upon the great Republican Party and upon its integrity as an organization of government that George W. Perkins or any other man contributed money to the campaign of the Republican Party for the purpose of paying its legitimate expenses. It seemed to be conceded the other day that such an act would be a crime; it seemed to be conceded that men largely interested in the conduct of the affairs of the Government might not contribute to the support of the party whose legislation and legislative policy was responsible for the prosperity in which they shared.

I am not willing that it should appear upon the records of this body that I concede any such thing. The business organizations represented by Mr. Perkins, or any other financial leader, are as much entitled, aye, it is as much their duty, to contribute to the expenses of conducting the contest between rival parties as it is the right or duty of any other citizen.

Is there any law, or would any Senator advocate the enactment of any law, that would make it an offense or offensive for a man having less than $100 to contribute to the campaign expenses of his party? Is there any difference in the moral principle between the act of contribution by the man having only $100 and the man having $100,000 or more? Is it a crime in this country to possess in excess of a certain amount of wealth? If it is, let it be written in the statute books. Would these men who here irresponsibly inveigh against the possession of wealth beyond a given sum support such a measure? They are everyone of them living in the hope that they may be within that class as speedily as possible; and yet within these walls only a few hours ago there was the titter of mirth and the evidence of applause and approval at an irresponsible attack upon the Republican Party because men appreciated the great services of that party which has brought prosperity, in which they share.

Mr. President, it is beneath the dignity; it is, in my judgment, a violation of the functions, of this body that such occurrences should transpire. It has gone to the country, uncontradicted until this hour, that the Republican Party was guilty of a wrong act when it received these contributions. Those who are responsible for such an attack remaining unanswered are not worthy to be members of that great organization. The Republican Party, like the armies of the world, is not all composed of fighting men; there are camp followers, men who trail along behind it in its march for the purpose of enjoying the crumbs of the camp; who are enrolled only so long as that enrollment means office, position, power, comfort, and emolument to them. They are not the Republican Party. The Republican Party is composed of men who are not in office to the extent of an overwhelming majority. So that I do not intend that the responsible part of the party shall be held under the charges made upon this floor on the day before yesterday.

It was a violation of no law or statute, constitutional or moral, that the subscriptions made to the campaign fund of 1904 should have been made either by the persons or in the amounts in which those subscriptions were made. Mr. President, no such assumption can be permitted to go out unchallenged, as it stands to this hour. Since when has it been an offense against any law to contribute voluntarily to the sustaining of principles that you advocate, to the selection of men representing those principles, to the selection of official and responsible bodies in Congress or elsewhere that will make those principles the rule of action and official conduct? Since when is it an offense to receive their assistance and support to any extent? Can right be too strongly supported? Can right receive the support of these men and be corrupted by it? I know of no such rule. We have grown so accustomed to accept dogma and dogmatic statements for reason and truth in this age of muckraking that sometimes it seems to me that statements ought to be branded.

Mr. President, of all the muckraking irresponsibility I have ever heard in a responsible place, that connected with the consideration of this question in and out of Congress has been the most radical. I animadvert upon the purpose or performance of no man more than another. I was offended by the suggestion, as I would be offended by any impropriety that might transpire in this body, that because a man had become an ex-President of the United States he should be open to attack in high places in responsible language, in print, which becomes and remains a part of the history of the country to the end of time, to be read by the growing and coming generations. We have a high responsibility that should render such a thing impossible. Because you oppose a man it does not relieve you from the responsibility of dignified consideration for public acts.

I am not, nor am I apt to be, a supporter of Col. Roosevelt for election as President of the United States; but I would not stand before an audience of the youth of this country and speak one word that would lessen their respect for the Presidency of the United States or those who have held that office. When you begin to lose sight of the fact of responsibility resting upon you to maintain the record of the dignity of our country and of those who hold the offices and places of honor, you have started to undermine and sap the stability of the Government. It rests only for the hour in our hands; but it rests for years in the generations that hear our words.

Much of the trouble that has come in this country has come from thoughtless, irresponsible attacks upon our Government, through the means of attacking the men who represent it; and it is a dangerous thing to do. I would not knowingly be guilty of speaking a word of disrespect against a man who had been President of the United States, whatever his political affiliations, in the presence of the children of the land; and when we speak here we speak in the presence of every child in every home and in every school. We not only speak in their presence, but we speak potently in the presence of those who are coming to our shores to form their impressions of our Government, and when they stand up and take the oath of allegiance it is meet and proper that their minds should not be clouded by the charges made by our own people as to the character of their responsibility.

I have always felt strongly upon this question. Some years ago a man invested with responsible duties in connection with education in our State, an ardent Republican, a supporter of mine, delivered an address before the public schools in which he told the children that the then President of the United States, Grover Cleveland, was a man of unclean life and disreputable. Word came to me, and I took steps to have him removed. He came to me with a piteous plea. He said:

I had not expected this from you. I have always supported you; and I thought you were my friend.

I said:

I am your friend, but I am also the friend of these children, and you ought to know that you have violated every rule of good citizenship and decency when you place that poison in the minds of children—children who should be taught to believe that the Government as represented by its Chief Executive is entitled to respect and confidence, especially in the minds of those children.

It was recalled to my mind as I stood here, and I thought of those people who see only the squibs and quips of the newspapers sent out in regard to this matter, selecting as they do the most virulent things that were said to be read throughout this land about a man who had been President of the United States and about a great party that had been responsible for great Presidents of the United States, and for the maintenance of the laws of the land—I thought of it and it hurt me to the heart to think that such things could happen. What promise is there for patriotism and support in the hour of difficulty or during the years of peace from generations into whose minds such things have been injected.

Mr. President, there is no occasion for the investigation of that condition about which Congress is absolutely impotent to act; as to which no good purpose can be served. What difference does it make in this day, except to the man who is actuated by a desire to get even with somebody; what good purpose can be served in this day by ascertaining the fact, if fact it be, that the Standard Oil Co., or the railroad companies, or any other business enterprise contributed one dollar or a million dollars to a campaign that has passed into history? If

I could not beat a man in a contest by fairer means than that I would not have a contest. I would go to some secluded corner of the earth where I could live out my life without coming into contact with such conditions, rather than to be whirled up in this dust cloud of investigation.

Let us return to sane lines of action. Let us step up onto a little higher plane of controversy as to who shall rule or make and execute the laws. The word "rule" has no proper application. No man rules the American people. They rule themselves. But let us see if we can not be of some assistance in elevating the standard of American citizenship. Differ as we may, let our controversies be between clean lines and within clean considerations.

Mr. President, there is no reason why the time of the Senate or of its Members should be occupied, or the country should be appealed to, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not George W. Perkins contributed this or any other sum to the Republican campaign fund, or whether any other man representing large aggregated and accumulated capital contributed to the campaign fund of the other party.

Now, we have some and are proposing to enact more legislation for the purpose of regulating this matter, for the purpose of saying that the real industries of the country, that the combinations of captial to which labor looks for employment shall not assist to bring about good government. It is a part and parcel of the milksop idea that has been creeping into our Government since men have been dealing in platitudes and innuendo, in the absence of courage and intelligence enough to speak out and act in the open.

Mr. President, the duty of this hour can not be shirked. I stand here to charge that this attempt to open up the sewers of political contests and turn loose the contents upon the plains of peace is a piece of political vandalism unequaled in the history of this country. Where do they flow? Not the best, if there is a best, but the worst, the foulest will flow farthest—flow out into the minds and comprehension of the people as a specimen of public and the acts of public men.

Do you think the question is not serious enough to claim our attention even at this hour? We have been drifting away from conservative lines in the consideration and determination of the character of the men that compose our body. It seems that it is only necessary to make a charge that some one is corrupt and immediately others accept the charge as a challenge, and we enter into this pool, swimming and groping around for all the foul flotsam upon its surface, and hugging it to our bosoms as we swim toward the shore and land at the door of the Senate of the United States, and bring it in as treasure trove, as though it was something that would add to the duties and dignity of this body.

Every presumption is in favor of the innocence of the citizen who is charged, even responsibly, with crime. Is the rule to be changed in this body so that every presumption will be in favor of the guilt of a man who is charged irresponsibly? Is there a man connected with these charges that dares go before a magistrate and place the responsibility of his oath behind a warrant for the detention or arrest of the accused? Is there one? It is the bad habit of talking about men behind their backs. That is not new. Years ago I adopted the rule that when a man attempts to talk to me about another man, to his detriment, I say, "Let us send for him before we proceed and let him be here, and you may talk in his presence." It ends the conversation.

Mr. President, whatever we may say of these political parties that have been contending for power for the last 50 years, I stand here to give them both a clean bill of health as parties. Men within them may transgress the rules, or what I consider to be the rules, of fair, candid, honorable action, but I do not hold the great parties responsible for it. I hold them responsible for the performance of the political duties that they profess. I give them credit for the performance of the political duties that they perform.

I am not given to attacking the private character of men because they are the candidates of the opposing party. I never believed that the wreck of a man whom you pull down is safe standing ground. When the contest is over he is still a citizen of the United States, with equal and coordinate rights; and yet we are starting out or proposing to, under this resolution, on a man hunt, to bring down somebody, to degrade him, and there is not a sworn statement or a responsible statement of any man here upon which he could be held for the charge.

I do not like it. It was because it has been pressed in upon me with such force that I have been impelled to speak on this occasion. We have no business, no right, to spend our time or the money of the Government groping back into past political campaigns for the purpose of developing some fact or charge that some one did something that some one would disapprove of. We have not the right to do it. Man to man, responsible Senators of the United States, presumed to know and bound to observe the rules of honorable men, are we justified in starting out on this man hunt?

It is the most unworthy thing that a man could engage in. I would not serve on a committee or remain a member of a committee whose only function was that of a bloodhound.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think there is no doubt we will be able to take an adjournment to-day. The only thing I understand that is holding us now is the deficiency appropriation bill. I think it is quite apparent that during the remainder of this day we can do no effective business. There are a number of Senators who expect to leave immediately after adjournment, and who have some minor arrangements to make before they leave, and I think it would be profitable if we might take a short recess.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will not make the motion, if the Senator objects.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly I object.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was undertaking to appeal to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am appealing on a very important subject to this body and to the American people. It is not customary to ask a Senator to yield and then move to adjourn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not moved to adjourn; I have not moved to take a recess. But I appeal to the Senator that the situation is as I state it—that it is quite evident we can not do any effective business during the remainder of this day. The only thing that is holding us from final adjournment is because this one bill is outstanding. There are a number of Senators who want to make some final arrangements and yet do not feel warranted in leaving so long as the Senate is in session, and I think it would be very well if we could take a recess until 4 o'clock.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not going to yield at all for the purpose of diverting the proceedings now going on in the Senate, and that is a proper defense of the Republican Party, of which I am a member.

Mr. BORAH. May I interrupt the Senator from Idaho?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. It is just for a moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I hope the Senate will not adjourn even after my colleague shall have concluded his remarks, because I shall insist upon taking up an important measure, in reference to the department of labor, whenever he finishes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am aware of the condition of business in the Senate. I, of course, shall yield immediately when the outstanding bill comes into this Chamber and will stand ready to adjourn at that time. But I am, at least in my judgment, performing a duty to my party and to the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know the Senator from Idaho has always been the friend of the western homesteader. I wish he would yield to me for a moment while I present a report from the Committee on Public Lands, favorably, upon a homestead bill. It is a very short bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. What bill is it? There are some public-land bills which I favor and some which I do not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a very short bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. With what subject does it deal?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It merely allows a man to perfect a homestead entry in lieu of one he abandoned.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, an individual case?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield to that, if I may.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho yields to the Senator from Oregon.

FRANK D. COURTADE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23604) for the relief of Frank D. Courtade, to report it favorably (S. Rept. 1069).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but I want to say that the bill should not be taken as a precedent for other bills. There are some things connected with it which I really think require that it should go over. But knowing the Senator's interest in the bill I shall not object to its consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the report made in the House upon this bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection that order will be made.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 975, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

FRANK D. COURTADE.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 23604.

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 23604) for the relief of Frank D. Courtrade, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out the name "Courtrade" where it appears in the title and insert in lieu thereof the name "Courtade."

Strike out the name "Courtrade" where it appears in line 5, on page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "Courtade."

Strike out the name "Courtrade" where it appears in line 14, on page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the name "Courtade."

Strike out the words "thirty one-hundredths" in line 5, on page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-one sixty-fourths."

In support of this report the following letter is hereby submitted:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 4, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your request for a report on H. R. 23604, a bill for the relief of Frank D. Courtrade.

Section 2289, Revised Statutes, provides that a homestead entry may not be made by a person who is the proprietor of more than 160 acres of land in any State or Territory. The object of the present bill is to remove the beneficiary's homestead disqualifications, incurred by reason of the fact that he was, on the dates mentioned in the bill, the owner of lands aggregating slightly more than the area named.

It should be noted that the name is properly spelled "Courtade."

The records of the General Land Office show that Mr. Courtade's application, mentioned in the bill, conflicts with four applications for the four several subdivisions under the timber and stone law. An issue was made up between Courtade and said applicants as to the right to enter the land in question, and said issue was decided in favor of Courtade by the Lakeview office and by the General Land Office, and also by the department on appeal from the General Land Office, so far as concerned the question of Courtade's good faith.

The department felt itself constrained, however, to hold, under the plain provisions of the law, that Courtade was disqualified to make entry on account of his ownership of more than 160 acres, the excess consisting of 3 town lots of an area of, as he says, thirty-one sixty-fourths of an acre. However, the decision to this effect, rendered January 9, 1912, has not yet become final, and the case is still pending before the department.

The department is informed that, after the decision by the local officers and the commissioner in favor of Courtade, he sold the 160 acres he owned and invested the entire proceeds in substantial improvements upon the land in question. This would indicate good faith on his part in applying to enter this land, and this is further shown by continued occupancy and improvement of the land by himself and family ever since he made his settlement. At the present time, therefore, Courtade is not disqualified on this ground to make the entry; but the department is without power to give him relief, inasmuch as there is a conflicting applicant under the timber and stone law for the land. This latter applicant, however, has done nothing upon the land and has simply his application pending.

The bill should be amended by striking out the name "Courtrade," where it appears in the title and in lines 5 and 14 on page 1, and inserting in lieu thereof the name "Courtade"; also, by striking out the words "thirty one-hundredths," in line 5, page 1, and inserting in lieu thereof "thirty-one sixty-fourths."

The department sees no objection to the bill as thus amended being enacted into law.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,
First Assistant Secretary.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 386, submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HEYBURN. For what purpose?

Mr. ASHURST. By the same token that the Senator from Oregon interrupted the Senator from Idaho. I have here a favorable report from the Committee on Indian Affairs upon a bill which I should like to have considered. I should like to make the report and to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, if the Senator will give me an opportunity.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it a House bill?

Mr. ASHURST. A House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. ASHURST. No. I polled the committee, and I secured a majority and the assent of all the members of the committee who are in the city.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senate will take up the calendar some time this afternoon, and I would prefer it if the Senator would not press his request, as the Senator from Idaho wants to speak.

Mr. ASHURST. There is an elaborate report from the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator kindly withhold his request until I can examine the report?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would have been well on to the goal if I had been allowed to proceed. I am not speaking as a stop-gap or for the purpose of consuming time, but I am speaking because I am impelled to do so by a sense of duty.

Mr. President, the resolution as now proposed is enlarged in its scope so as to include an investigation of the campaign under which the President now in office was elected. It is sought to institute a probe into the transactions affecting his election of which he had knowledge. It is sought to prove that those transactions were illegal and in violation of good conscience and that therefore the President of the United States, now in office, was guilty of temporizing with good morals.

Mr. President, an attempt to do that in an irresponsible way is unworthy of any man or any body of men. The man who attacks the President of the United States as to his integrity, except that he does it in a responsible way, is not worthy of an audience or of consideration or of a lot of other things, because if there is a man more helpless than another against that kind of attack it is the man who is President of the United States. However much I might disapprove of his acts, however much I might be displeased from a personal standpoint, if such were the case, in regard to his acts, I would never make an irresponsible attack upon him. I would go to him, and the matter would end with that meeting. We see too much of it. Some puny, little, irresponsible newspaper, whose editor or proprietor could not respond to a liability of 15 cents, attacks the President of the United States merely because the President is not there.

Mr. President, what is true of that class of newspapers is true of those who class themselves as great journals in the country. Within the last 48 hours there have been things published about the President of the United States for which the man who is guilty of publishing them should be beaten down into the mud under the feet of man as you would trample a reptile that attacks humanity. There is a species of cowardice to that kind of attack that ought to merit the contempt of every right-thinking man. Would one of them walk up to the White House and make the statements that have been made in the papers within the last 48 hours about the President of the United States?

Would any one of them confront Mr. Roosevelt with the statements that have been made within the last 48 hours in the newspapers and elsewhere? Would they walk up before that stalwart specimen of manhood and charge him to his face with the things they have charged against him under the cover of miles? If they would not, then not only are they unworthy but their statements are unworthy. Am I talking strained morality? Am I straining the principles of morality that should pertain between citizens of this country? I think not.

I had hoped as the years went by that a better condition of affairs would exist, but I am discouraged in this hour when I find that the most condemned, abused, and despised men are those whose good character 90,000,000 of people have certified.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will have more respect for its functions and more respect for the individual character of Senators than to enter upon such an investigation as is proposed by the resolution of the afternoon. What good purpose can it serve? It can serve purposes, but they are not good purposes. They are unholy, they are disreputable, and they are purposes that tend to the bad and not to the good.

Does anyone propose to act upon any disclosures that might result from this investigation and put individual responsibility behind that action? Suppose it transpires that Mr. Perkins gave half a million dollars or a quarter million dollars into a campaign fund for the purpose of bringing about the election of the Republican ticket, what then? Was that a violation of the law? No one with intelligence will pretend that it was. Suppose the investigation discloses that in the last campaign of four years ago men whose interests were at stake—not only whose individual interests were at stake but who represented thousands and tens of thousands of others whose interests were at stake—contributed. Was that a crime? If so, this is no criminal court. If it was a crime, go where crimes are punished and put your individual responsibility behind a sworn warrant for their arrest. Put your pocketbook and not that of the Nation behind the prosecution, and stay there, attend upon the trial at whatever inconvenience, and perform a public duty. They will not one of them do it. They will put behind their hands and say, "Did you hear how that investigation came out? Why, so and so gave $100,000"; and they will look and stare at each other as though they had established the existence of a conspiracy or a crime, when the fact would be that a man with vast interests resting upon the stability of intelligent government and having in his hands the interests of thousands of employees had contributed to the success of that upon which his prosperity depended, not by bribing any man, not by any unlawful use of money, but contributed to the natural and legitimate expense of organizing a campaign of education, a campaign that should carry to every corner of the country the truth into the minds of the voters—the truth, not some false statements, but that upon which the voter might base his action. And yet, in this whispered conference somebody would be told that that was a crime, and the man who did it would be looked upon as a criminal.

Is the purpose of the investigation proposed in order that we may lay the foundation for that kind of thing? Are there no honest men in this country except the person who is inveighing against the honesty of men? Can only one honest man stand up at one time and speak at one time? Are we to give confidence or credence to the man whose occupation, whenever he opens his mouth, is to accuse some other man of misdoing and try to drag him down? Is such a man as that worthy of any consideration at the hands of the American people?

Mr. President, there is not a word in all this muddle of charge that we have heard in all these recitations and whereases, there is not a word upon which any charge of misconduct or dishonorable action at the hands of any man could be based. The papers came out the night before, Wednesday, I think it was, and undertook to convey the impression that Senator PENROSE had been bribed in the performance of his duty as chairman of a committee of the Congress of the United States, not merely by innuendo but a charge; and when it was investigated it transpired that as chairman of the Republican State central committee of Pennsylvania he had received a contribution for the benefit of the Republican Party, not for his own use. Now, even those bearers of false testimony and false witnesses would not dare to stand up and say that there was any possible ground to charge Senator PENROSE with being guilty of a treasonable act in receiving that check for $25,000. The testimony is before the Senate and before the people. Have you seen any retraction or apology for the foul lie that was printed in the paper which charged that he received it as chairman of a committee of this body because of the manner in which he had performed his official duty? Retract it! The only way the coward ever retracts is to flee or hide himself.

Mr. President, they do not need to investigate that $25,000 nor the $100,000 which was given by Mr. Archbold to the treasurer of the Republican Party. There was no crime or misdemeanor or misbehavior in doing either of those things. But they started out on a man hunt, and when they found themselves practically out of occupation they undertook to amend their resolutions so as to give them authority to go out and hunt a man anyhow, and pull him down. They propose to get bloodhounds to help them. They want authority to hire men more skillful than themselves to do it. I do not vote for it. I do not approve of it.

Mr. President, there are other ways of contesting the election of candidates for office than by defiling them. There is a little black and white animal found in the swamps whose only method of warfare is to defile its enemy. I do not want to see that method adopted with the consent of the United States Senate. We will do what we can to defeat the aspirations of Theodore Roosevelt in his atempt to be elected President of the United States, but we will do it so that we can look the world in the face when we have accomplished it. We will do what we can to defeat the election of Woodrow Wilson, not because we hate the man, not because we despise the man, but because we stand for a principle of government that we deem essential to the welfare of the people and the perpetuity of their institutions.

Let us keep within those lines.

I could not allow this occasion to pass without an attempt on my part to get the question up out of the slough upon the green fields, on the solid road of controversy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the situation in the country, which the Senator from Idaho views with so little sympathy and with so much regret, is a regrettable situation. There can be no doubt of that. It is pathetic. It is shameful. Here stand the two factions of the Republican Party accusing one another of very nearly everything and proving a great part of it, or at any rate asking the consent of the Senate of the United States to prove what they say they can establish. However great may be the regret of the Senator from Idaho, he can not avoid this condition "of charge and challenge" to which he refers. These two parties have already "charged and challenged" one another. One has charged, the other has accepted the challenge, and has charged again. It passes human comprehensibility to prevent the fight from going on. God alone could prevent it, and He does not seem to be inclined to do it. Somebody is either telling the truth or telling a falsehood. I do not know who, neither does the Senator from Idaho know who. Somebody is preaching and hypocrisyzing, if I may invent the word, and somebody else is telling the truth. I do not know who is doing which nor which is being done by whom; neither does the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. President, there is a vast difference between attacking government and attacking governors, between attacking institutions and attacking men in office. If what Mr. Roosevelt has alleged about Senator PENROSE be true, Senator PENROSE deserves to go out of this body without day. If what Senator PENROSE says about Mr. Roosevelt be true, Mr. Roosevelt is entirely ineligible, to express it in the most charitable way, to be Presideat of the United States.

As for myself, Mr. President, I have none of that superstition about place and position and office that would lead me to give any reverence to any man because he is a President or a judge or a Senator, or anything else. If John Smith be an honest man and be a gentleman and a justice of the peace or a constable or private citizen, I have as high regard for him as I have for John Smith, a gentleman and an honest man and President of the United States or a judge of the Supreme Court. If John Smith be not a gentleman and not an honest man, a liar and a bribe taker or a bribe giver, I have just as little respect for him if he were in the toga of a judge of the Supreme Court or the habiliments of a President of the United States as I have for him as a constable or a justice of the peace or a private citizen. I have never been able to subscribe to the doctrine that men ever owe any reverence to office, position, or place. I positively deny that. They do owe reverence to honesty wherever it is to be found.

The Senator from Idaho is right in this, that men ought to be more particular about making charges against men who have been placed in position by the people than against other men. They ought to be more careful, because their respect for the people, and themselves as a part of the people, should lead them rather to solve doubts in favor of men who have received the fiat of popular approval than to solve doubts against them.

But I can not nurse the delusion that President Roosevelt's sins, if he have any, were not the sins of the Republican Party. I can not see how the Senator from Idaho can stand out from under the burden, if there be any burden, of official Republican presidential crimes or sins. I do not know that there is any. I am waiting for the proof on both sides, or either, perhaps neither; I do not know; but at any rate, the Senator from Idaho can not, as a Republican, stand out from under the burden of disgrace that might have been brought upon the country by a Republican President who accepted a large amount of money from a public malefactor, "a malefactor of great wealth," to use his own language, if he accepted it. I do not know whether he did or not. He says he did not; a Senator of the United States said he did. One of the chief "malefactors" said he did, and he says he did not.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I mean, by chief malefactor, for fear the Senator may have misunderstood me, is the head of the Standard Oil Trust.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to correct the Senator. There is no denial that the money was received that I have ever seen in print.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, no——

Mr. PENROSE. There was an allegation——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not now weighing the testimony, Mr. President. I believe the Senator is right. There has thus far been no denial of the fact that the money was received.

Mr. PENROSE. The only statement——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The only denial, as I understand it, is that the ex-President knew that it was received. He asserts he said if it had been received he would give it back. I believe that is about the extent of the testimony as far as it has gone.

Mr. PENROSE. The only denial that I can ascertain is the letter which seemed to be carried around the person of the defendant ready for delivery to all inquirers, a letter written directing the return of the money after it had been received, after a requisition for a further amount had been refused, and after the money had been spent. The money was never returned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not desire to go into the testimony. I merely want to express the idea that neither the Senator from Idaho, nor I, nor you, Mr. President, nor anybody, can avoid an unavoidable conflict. Here are assertions upon both sides, and if their assertions be true the one or the other side is disgraced and shamed. Now, then, all that is demanded by the pending resolution, as I understand it, is that the very truth of the matter shall be inquired into.

The Senator from Idaho says it makes no difference whether big politics receive big contributions from big business or not, or, at any rate, although he did not express it in that language, his position amounts to that. For a long, long time the moral sense of mankind has recognized that big business ought to be divorced from big politics, and that big politics ought to be divorced from big business. It has recognized, ever since the human conscience was born, the fact that a man, or a set of men, or an interest does not contribute an immense amount of money just for fun. There must be somewhere either an actual or an anticipated quid pro quo. When the Senator argues that great interests are to be justified for contributing to that party which has "contributed to their prosperity," and, as he expressed it, "to the prosperity of thousands of people dependent upon them," he is merely explaining the quid pro quo, that big business, big finance, financial leaders shall contribute to a party's expenditures in a campaign and shall do it because they recognize that that particular party has served their special interest and——

Mr. HEYBURN. And nobody else?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And has contributed to their prosperity. No; I did not say nobody else. I am more logical than to have said that. They do not care how many other people——

Mr. HEYBURN. Prosper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The party has contributed to the prosperity of, so far as their contribution is concerned, provided only they think the party has contributed to their special-interest prosperity. The evidence in this case shows that the Standard Oil Co. thought that a contribution of $25,000 to the State campaign in Pennsylvania and a contribution of $100,000 to the national Republican campaign in the country was on their side of prosperity, and that so far as the Standard Oil special interest was concerned it was on that side of the party line, and that they were paying a quid wtih a hope of receiving at some time a quo.

Mr. President, if a President of the United States has received $100,000 as a contribution from a special interest, and that interest one by his own profession outlawed, one by his own profession a criminal, whether his profession was sincere or hypocritical, it will not do to say that if he received $100,000 from it he received it like a little, innocent babe, like a sweet little child with a smile upon its face, and expected it to mean nothing. Of course he knew it meant something if he received it. The Senator from Pennsylvania knew it meant something. But if either received it, did it mean corruption of a personal character? No; it did not mean that necessarily; but it did mean, without necessity of expressing one's self in full verbiage, "We will stand together. I am helping you; and when the time comes you will have to help me, and when the time comes when you can help me, if you do not help me I will denounce you as an ingrate, and you will be in the bottom of your heart an ingrate, because you have accepted something, understanding what it meant, and you refused to pay back in kind." This great alliance between big business and big politics means that.

Mr. President, the Senator draws a comparison between a man who should contribute $50, I believe he said, to a national campaign fund and another man who should contribute $100,000, and he says there is no difference. The difference is simply immense. One represents almost nothing except patriotism and love of party, the idea of furthering a political principle, and the idea of putting into position the masters of a particular school of political thought. The other represents a check, cash essentially, in a word money, in the long run graft, graft expected or graft actual, I do not care which. The Senator was exactly right in his treatment of the school superintendent in Idaho, because when that school superintendent said that the private life of Grover Cleveland was unclean he showed that he was lying, and a man capable of lying is not fit to teach children.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But an attack upon a man and an attack upon government are different.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does not the Senator think that it was sufficient reason for the action that he told it, whether true or not? Is it necessary that it should have been untrue? Would not the violation of proper morals and ethics have been as great whether it were true or not true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not prepared to go that far. If a citizen of the United States, one of the 90,000,000 of joint sovereigns of this great country, is of the opinion that his servant is unclean, publicly or privately, he has a right to say so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that is so——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment. He has a right to say so under this condition only: That he ought to be careful to see to it that he had a reasonable ground, a reasonable degree of certainty to act upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. Should he have entered into an investigation of the President of the United States for the purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. How could he? That reminds me of the other position taken by the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. That illustrates the unsoundness of that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How could he?

Mr. HEYBURN. In passing let me ask the Senator does he think it right and proper to dwell upon the use of that term "a servant of the people"? He is a representative of the people. I do not like the use of the term "servant" as applied to the President of the United States. He is a chosen representative; he is not a hired man.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not enter into that. Of course, the phrase "A hired man" carries a sort of a menial aspect. A President is not a menial.

Mr. HEYBURN. Any more than a servant?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But at the same time the President is hired and paid by the people to do certain things; he is appointed for the purpose of doing them. He is a salaried man, if not a hired man.

Mr. HEYBURN. He is a representative.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can not make me say that the President of the United States, or a Senator, ought to be the people's slave. He ought not, but he ought to be in that sense in which Christ used the term, "the people's servant": "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant."

So the President of the United States is a public servant, although not a public slave. He is a salaried man and he owes certain duties, not to himself and his own conscience only, but to the people and to the people's conscience and the people's will. I do not mean by that that a President or a Senator or Representative ought ever to cast a vote or do a thing contrary to what he thinks right merely because there is a popular majority the other way, but I do mean that when he has in the slightest degree a doubt about it he ought rather to be ruled by the opinion of others than by his own stubbornness.

Mr. President, the Senator spoke of the "duty of financial leaders" to contribute to campaign funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would assess them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The duty to contribute within certain limits to the funds of a political party that a man might think right, I can readily understand. That there should be any duty upon his part, however, I certainly do not comprehend; and when he contributes vast amounts of money, it is evident that he is contributing with the view to vast benefit some time or other, unless he happens to be a very rich and philanthropic altruist, who might contribute an equal amount of money to a public library or to a public charity, and he might regard the Republican Party as an object of philanthropy; but there have not been many of those. As a rule, they have given their money to some other cause; and, if the Senator would pardon me for saying so, they have easily found it possible to give their money to better causes.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho that men in discussing political questions ought to be guided as little as possible by personal animosity or hatred or revenge or dislike, and that they ought to be guided as much as possible by their attitude toward public measures, toward what one party or the other chooses to do. I frankly confess, I would vote for a bad Democrat rather than a good Republican, because I could get rid of the bad Democrat at the next party primary, but I could not get rid of the Republican, even though he were a good Republican, and the better Republican he was, as a Republican, the worse he would be from my standpoint. I could not get rid of him in another party primary.

But, all the same, it will not do to take the position that the average American citizen has nothing to say and nothing to do about a man's wrongful public or private conduct merely because he is a public officer. It is blind, abject, monarchical, and imperial superstition to think that I owe a single duty to the Senator from Idaho or to the Senator from Wisconsin that I would not owe to either one of them if he were in private life, or that I owe a single reverence, observance, or duty to William H. Taft that I would not owe to him if he were in private life, or that I owe a single observance, reverence, or duty to the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, even with his gown on, that I would not owe to him in private life, except that a man, in respect to popular institutions, ought to be more cautious about believing wrong things about public servants, who have at least received the flat of the approval of the people, than he ought about men who have not received that flat. Men who, therefore, have not come to him introduced by such a magnificent sponsor as the American people. All history proves that the people of this country elect men to office and rulers frequently appoint men to office who are thoroughly unworthy; and, if so, the people ought to know it; and the very utmost extent of a congressional inquiry ought to be brought to bear as an instrumentality to do what? To persecute anybody? No. To revenge one's feelings upon anybody? To "get even" with anybody? No; but to find out what the very truth and the very right of the case is.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I only desire to detain the Senate a moment, because I am not willing to vote against this resolution without incorporating a statement of my reasons for that vote in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I will not vote for this resolution or for any resolution which authorizes an investigation into the methods by which Presidents are nominated or into the methods by which Presidents are elected, because the Congress of the United States has no more power to regulate the election of a President than it has to regulate the election of a State legislature. The Constitution of the United States provides that the President shall be chosen by electors, and it specifically provides that the electors of each State shall be chosen in such manner as the legislature of that State may direct. In other words, every State in this Union has a perfect right and has the ample constitutional power to choose its electors exactly as it sees fit. For many years the State of South Carolina elected her electors by the legislature. Within the memory of all Senators here the State of Michigan elected her electors by congressional districts.

If it be true—and I suppose nobody will dispute it—that the electors are to be chosen as the legislatures of the States may prescribe, then where does the Congress derive its power to regulate their election or to take any part in the election of those electors?

I think no Senator on this side, at least, would be willing to say that the Congress of the United States could pass a law regulating the election of members of any State legislature; and yet I assert that Congress has a better right and a clearer power to pass a law of that kind than it has to pass a law of this kind. I say that because the Constitution expressly declares that the Congress shall have the power to regulate the times, places, and manner of electing Representatives and Senators, except that it has no power to specify the place at which a Senator shall be chosen. That, of course, was intended to leave the State to choose a Senator at the capital, where its legislature naturally would assemble; but, subject to that, the power of Congress to regulate the time and manner of electing Senators is unrestricted.

I have never myself been in favor of exercising that power; and from my boyhood I have been prompt to declare against Federal election laws. I do not believe it any more permissible for Congress to assume control of our elections when it is a question of money than when it was a question of negro suffrage. I was opposed to such a course in that case and I am opposed to it in this case, because, if the States of the Union can not be trusted to protect their elective franchise, no power residing in Congress will ultimately save this Republic.

But whether I am right or wrong about that, and whether Congress ought to exercise the power to regulate the times, places, and manner of electing Representatives and Senators in Congress, I repeat that no Senator, so far as I know, has ever asserted on this floor—although I believe Senator Hoar did save the question once in a report which he made in the Indiana contested-election case—the power of Congress to regulate the election of Members of a State legislature, because Congress had power to regulate the manner of electing Senators.

How much stronger is the case against congressional interference with electors? I invite the Senate for a moment to compare the language of the two provisions. Without stopping to hunt for it through the volume which contains the Constitution—I think I have already substantially repeated it—after saying that the times, places, and manner may be regulated by the State, the Constitution expressly provides that—

> The Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

When we come to the election of a President, let us see what the Constitution says:

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

The only limitation imposed by the Constitution on the power of the States, as thus expressed, is that no Senator or Representative or other person holding a Federal office shall be eligible to election as an elector; but, outside of that, the State elects or appoints whom it pleases, and in any manner it pleases. The State can elect its electors by ballot at a general election; it can elect them by the legislature; the State could raffle those positions off at a game of hazard, if it chose; it could provide that on a certain day all who chose to participate might assemble at the capital, and out of a box should draw lots, and that those who drew the slip of paper with "elector" on it should be deemed to be an elector of that State.

Indeed, Mr. President, I go further. I declare that, if a State were foolish and base enough to do it, it could auction the choice of its electors off to the highest bidders, and such a choice could not be nullified by Congress, unless the Congress should decide that by such a procedure a State had destroyed its republican form of government.

Mr. President, I ought to say in that connection that the Constitution does reserve to Congress the right to fix the day on which electors shall be chosen and to fix the day on which those electors shall cast their votes, which day, it is provided, shall be the same throughout the United States.

That provision, it is said, was inserted in the Constitution so as to prevent any prearrangement among the electors as to the person for whom they would cast their vote; but that was one of the very few cases in which the foresight of our fathers failed to accomplish its object. They did not foresee the time when political parties would make their nominations and when electors would be pledged in advance to vote for a particular candidate. But whatever the purpose of it was, Congress reserved over those electors only those two powers—one to fix the day when they were to be chosen, and the other to fix the day when they should cast their votes. Subject to that it left the whole power over the presidential election to the States; and, Mr. President, I intend, so far as my vote is concerned, to leave it with them.

My friends over here are eager to prevent the use of money in elections, but they are not more eager in that respect than I am. If I had my way, I would enact a law in every State of this Union forbidding any candidate for any office to spend one farthing for any purpose except for his travel and his hotel bills. Then the poor man would be at no disadvantage in the race against a rich man. My opinion is that under a system of that kind only men of the highest character and the greatest ability would be nominated, because with no purse long enough to send agents into every community, to instruct, in the case of a good man, and to mislead, in the case of a bad man, the average voter of the country would be compelled to judge men by his knowledge of their character and public services. As the matter now stands a campaign fund, if large enough, is better than a long and honorable public service. A campaign fund, if large enough, counts more than patriotism, character, and ability. I would free American politics from that curse forever.

I may be permitted to say, as I can not vote for a proposition of this kind, that I have lived up to my philosophy. I never in my life paid any man a penny to do anything for me in politics; I never paid any man to write a line in my behalf; I never paid any newspaper or other publication a penny to publish anything in my behalf. Recently the seat which I am soon to vacate became the subject of a contest between honorable gentlemen in my own State. One of the candidates spent fourteen or fifteen thousand dollars, and another, who rather boasted of his economy, spent over $4,000. Mr. President, this illustrates the hurtful change in our political conditions. I was elected to the House of Representatives five times, and with an opponent at every election; I was elected to the Senate twice; and my total expenditures in the seven elections were less than a third of the smaller expenditure of the two leading candidates for my seat. I boast no virtue over either of them; I claim no patriotism that I would not freely accord to them; but, sir, it is a change in the times, and perhaps that change in the times is bringing with it changes in men. If candidates themselves will not set their faces like flint against the pernicious practice of using money, the law ought to compel them to do so; and I hope to see the State in which I live, and which has so long honored me, take the lead in this as it has in so many other useful and admirable reforms.

The only thing that ever could tempt me to hold another office would be—and if others do not, I think I shall myself accept an election to the legislature of the State from the county in which I live—to go there and put a law upon our statute books forbidding the men who seek the honors of the people to pursue them with cash.

Not only, sir, would I prohibit the candidate himself expending anything except for his traveling expenses and his entertainment at hotels, but I would make it a crime for his friends to spend it for him, and we should again go back to those elder and those better days, when the people chose their public servants free from the debauchery of campaign funds. But that is a work for the States to do; the Congress can not do it.

I want to say to our friends on this side of the Chamber that when you habituate the Congress to passing one Federal election law after another, in session after session and Congress after Congress, then, sir, you will plead in vain when some Member of the opposition proposes a law to regulate elections with another object. Our majority is in sight now, but it will all depend upon the wisdom with which we use it. There is just one victory for the Democratic Party in the present divisions of the Republican Party, and only one. Whether we shall from that time on succeed ourselves will depend upon our own conduct and our own wisdom. If we choose the next President of the United States and he administers this Government with fidelity both to the people and to the principles of the Constitution, then, sir, we will enter upon a new career of power and glory like unto that upon which we entered with the first presidency of Thomas Jefferson.

From 1800 to 1860 the Democratic Party lost but three presidential elections and never lost two of them in succession. Then came that dreadful slavery question to divide and embitter us and to make the Democrats of the South and the Democrats of the North almost as hostile to each other as if they belonged to different parties, and sometimes as if they belonged to different countries. Out of our division grew the Republican Party and the Republican Party's opportunity; and from 1860 to 1912 we have defeated the Republican Party but three times, and they stole it from us one of those times—I withdraw that word; that is not a word that ought to be used in the Senate of the United States, and if it is a little softer I will say they defrauded us out of it in 1876; but, with that counted to our credit, we have defeated them but three times in these 52 years, and never twice in succession.

Gentlemen on the other side, you have run your course, and you are just as certain to wait outside for the next 50 years as we have waited outside for the last 50 years [laughter], if we are as wise as I devoutly pray we will be. I am not calculating upon your divisions continuing, nor am I calculating upon three parties of important numbers in this country. There is not room for one conservative party and two radical parties, nor is there room for two conservative parties and one radical party in this country. There will come a dissolution and a reorganization; and I think I see some evidences of it now. I notice that down in West Virginia—if it is permissible to talk politics in the Senate—the Republicans and the Progressives have coalesced on a State ticket. I designate them by different names because they claim them, and I really have found great satisfaction in seeing the ex-President appropriate the name "Progressive," because that will spare me having my Democratic friends tell me from time to time that they are "Progressives." It is impossible that the "Progressives" should be in earnest, if they fuse with the Republicans, like they are doing down in West Virginia. It is more a matter of offices with them than it is a matter of principle. If I believed about them what the Republicans say about them, I would not have any fellowship with them; and if I believed about the Republicans what the Progressives say about them, then I would not have any fellowship with the Republicans; and, believing the worst that each says about the other, of course I have no temptation to join either of those parties. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, all levity aside, the time may come when that old and most perplexing question of the South—the negro question—will project itself again into American politics. The nominee of the Progressive Party shows his willingness to do that, whenever he can profit by it. Down South, where the negro vote does not count, he not only makes the negro wait for the second table, but compels him to eat in the kitchen, while in the North, where the negro vote is potential in many States, he invites the negro, if the newspapers tell the truth, to the banquets which were provided for him in the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. President, one of the most remarkable spectacles ever witnessed in this country was at the Chicago convention, with Roosevelt at one end of the corridor preaching civic righteousness and his agents at the other end tempting the ignorant negroes of the South to obtain their votes. That can not continue. The American people will come to their senses, and we will again have a contest in this country not only over the principles of this Government but over its administration.

This much I will say, and this much I rejoice to say, that we will never again be compelled to fight over the old struggle to destroy the partnership between politics and industry. I remember a few years ago when the corporations did not concern themselves about the more extreme men in politics. They had no fear that the time would ever come when their rights would be jeopardized in the American Congress; their fear was that their special privileges might be abridged; and, under that belief, they did not hesitate to select as victims men who were ready to defend their rights with zeal and with such poor ability as they might command, but who were likewise as ready to defend with zeal and with ability the rights of the American people. As between the heedless demagogue and the thoughtful public servant they chose the demagogue, because they thought at most the demagogue could only disgust the thoughtful and intelligent people of the land and thus still further fortify their special privileges; but they have lived to learn better than that. In the last 10 years they have seen the very men whose presence in legislative assemblies they welcomed as a disgusting exhibition grow in numbers and in power, until they have taken a just alarm, and to-day they would flee for protection to the men whom a few years ago they denounced with savage fury.

They have created, sir, a sentiment in this country which, being once aroused, has now gone too far; but so surely as God lives and rules this universe, so surely as the American people are capable of self-government, they will come back to a normal condition of mind, and upon the old principle will fight over again the intellectual battle of freedom.

In that day those who may differ with me will acknowledge our intellectual and personal honesty, just as their fathers acknowledged the intellectual and personal honesty of my fathers. And on this side of the Chamber we will feel no inclination to impeach the patriotism or the integrity of our adversaries. It will be a contest over principles, sir, and out of that contest will come the political and intellectual regeneration of this Republic.

Mr STONE. Mr. President, the situation now confronting the Senate is a novel and interesting one. It is well to ask what that situation is and how it has arisen. It arises primarily out of a factional and embittered controversy between conflicting elements in the Republican Party. The whole country is aware that for many months a conflict over questions of great importance and involving radical differences has been waged between distinguished leaders and opposing elements in the Republican Party. We have for quite a long while, for two or three years at least, heard talk in this Chamber and in the House of Representatives—and throughout the country——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Missouri permit an interruption from the Chair?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This morning, during the consideration of morning business, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] submitted a report which gave rise to a somewhat lengthy discussion. The morning hour expired. By unanimous consent leave was granted to continue the morning business.

More than two hours have elapsed since that leave was granted, and the Chair feels constrained now to say that morning business has closed, and the resolution under consideration will go to the calendar. The Chair thanks the Senator from Missouri for permitting this interruption.

Mr. STONE. Under that ruling I am not at liberty to proceed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent that a vote may be taken upon the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is well known that there are a number of nominations pending here which will have to be considered at once if they are to be considered at all before the dissolution of this session of Congress. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I had the request for unanimous consent pending before the Senator made his motion. My request was for unanimous consent that a vote be taken upon this resolution without further debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I object to the request for unanimous consent. That disposes of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask to have printed in the RECORD certain newspaper clippings in relation to this matter. The first is from the New York World.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The article will be printed as requested.

The article is as follows:

WORLD SAID THREE YEARS AGO T. R. WOULD SPRING CORTELYOU LETTER—STANDARD OIL PEOPLE KNEW HE HAD WRITTEN IT TO MAKE POLITICAL CAPITAL IF HE SHOULD BE ACCUSED OF RECEIVING TRUST CONTRIBUTION AND DEMANDING MORE.

The World on September 25, 1908, told what happened in regard to the Standard Oil contributions to the Roosevelt campaign fund of 1904 and gave the facts contained in the charges made by Senator PENROSE in his sensational speech of Wednesday, in which he declared that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Cortelyou had approved a gift of $125,000 from the Standard Oil Co. and that Mr. Roosevelt had even demanded an extra $150,000, which, had it been granted, would have brought the contribution of the Rockefeller corporation up to $275,000.

In this article the World told how, early in the campaign of 1904, the Standard Oil Co., as well as other trusts, railroads, banks, and large corporations, received a request to contribute to the Roosevelt campaign fund. The first request made of the Standard Oil Co. was refused, Mr. H. H. Rogers being responsible for its refusal.

Later, when the second call for campaign funds was made, Mr. Cortelyou, chairman of the Republican national campaign committee, sent word to Mr. Rogers asking for an appointment at which the then existing conditions could be explained and the financial support of the Standard Oil Co. secured.

BLISS KEEPS CORTELYOU'S APPOINTMENT.

This appointment was made, and Mr. Cortelyou was informed that both Mr. Rogers and Mr. Archbold would be pleased to see him. Mr. Cortelyou, finding that Mr. Rogers was not to meet him alone, but that Mr. Archbold also would be present, concluded that it would be safer and more discreet not to go himself. The appointment was kept by Cornelius N. Bliss, treasurer of the national committee.

At this interview the Standard Oil men accused Mr. Roosevelt of ingratitude, and recalled many past favors from the Standard Oil Co. to Republican candidates and campaign funds. Mr. Bliss admitted that President Roosevelt might have acted harshly toward Standard Oil, but said that while Mr. Roosevelt's first term had been "constructive," his second term would be "conservative."

Relying upon these assurances, Mr. Rogers and Mr. Archbold made a contribution of $100,000. This contribution coming to the knowledge of Mr. Roosevelt, the then President wrote to Mr. Cortelyou a letter denouncing the Standard Oil Co. and directing the return of this contribution.

ROOSEVELT'S ANCHOR TO WINDWARD.

This letter is on Mr. Cortelyou's file, and a copy of it was kept by Mr. Roosevelt for the purpose of making it public if ever the facts of this Standard Oil contribution became known. (This letter was published by President Roosevelt on Wednesday, exactly as the World said it would be, nearly three years ago.)

The Standard Oil contribution of $100,000 was not returned. Not one cent was paid back. The same was used, as far as Mr. Rogers and Mr. Archbold know, in like manner with other contributions.

Later in the campaign—the World story of September 25, 1908, told—when Mr. Roosevelt became scared about the result and about the time that he summoned Mr. Harriman to Washington and induced Mr. Harriman to raise $260,000 for the campaign fund, a further request was made upon the Standard Oil people.

At the time of the $100,000 contribution Mr. Bliss had expressed his dissatisfaction with its size, and said that the amount should have been several times as great. At the time of the third request the definite sum of $250,000 additional was asked for. (In his speech Senator PENROSE charged that the additional sum asked for was $150,000.)

MAKING POLITICAL CAPITAL.

But the Standard Oil people had learned of Mr. Roosevelt's letter to Mr. Cortelyou and of the direction to return the $100,000. They declined to give any more money and recalled the fact that the President's instructions to return the $100,000 had not been complied with, and that Mr. Roosevelt must have known all along that the $100,000 which he had repudiated had not only been accepted, but had been used.

In view of this fact they declined to accede to the request for a further $250,000 or any other sum, and denounced Mr. Roosevelt for seemingly trying on the one hand to secure contributions from the Standard Oil Co., and on the other hand to make political capital by denouncing the company.

Since this article was written Mr. Rogers has died and Mr. Bliss has died, and the attempt is now being made to place the stain of this transaction upon dead men.

EXACTLY WHAT MR. CORTELYOU SAID.

Mr. Cortelyou, who also denied all knowledge of the Harriman fund of $260,000, stated on oath before the Senate committee on July 11 that he knew nothing of and had never even heard of any contributions to Mr. Roosevelt's campaign fund of 1904 from Mr. Archbold, or from anyone else in any way connected with the Standard Oil Co. The following is an exact transcript of Mr. Cortelyou's testimony upon this point:

By Senator LEA. Did Mr. Rockefeller or Mr. Rogers contribute, representing the oil interests?

Mr. CORTELYOU. I do not remember anything of the kind.

By Senator LEA. Mr. Archbold?

Mr. CORTELYOU. No, sir. Never. I do not recall Mr. Archbold contributing a cent.

Later in the hearings on the same day, Senator CLAPP, the chairman of the committee, took a hand at questioning Mr. Cortelyou, and the queries and answers are thus reported:

By the CHAIRMAN. Did you know of John D. Archbold or anyone in his behalf making a contribution?

Mr. CORTELYOU. No, sir. I never heard of it—Mr. Archbold, or any one in his behalf, making a contribution.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to submit, with the request that it be printed in the RECORD, parts of an article from the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, Pa., of August 23, reciting facts in connection with the indictment of E. A. Van Valkenburg for bribery, one of the matters referred to by me in my privileged statement a day or two ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VAN VALKENBURG EXPLANATION IS FLATLY DENIED—POTTSVILLE PROSECUTOR SAYS EDITOR'S FRIENDS PLEADED FOR SETTLEMENT OF BRIBERY SUIT—PAID $8,000 IN COSTS—DECLARES IF CASE IS REOPENED HE CAN STILL CONVICT PUBLISHER ON CHARGE.

W. J. Whitehouse, chief of counsel for the Commonwealth in the case of Commonwealth v. E. A. Van Valkenburg, in which the Schuylkill County grand jury found a true bill in 1897, charging the Roosevelt leader with conspiracy and attempt to bribe a legislator, to-day branded as false the declaration of Van Valkenburg that the case was settled by the prosecution.

"Mr. Van Valkenburg's friends and his counsel pleaded on their knees for a settlement," declared Mr. Whitehouse, in replying to the statement of Van Valkenburg. "If Van Valkenburg will ask to have the nolle-pros removed and will grant six months' time for us to get our witnesses together and prepare the case, we can still convict him of attempt at bribery," he added.

This was the reply Mr. Whitehouse made to the Roosevelt leader. He has been suffering from a long illness, and was unable to go to his office to refer to his papers bearing upon the case. Yet this lawyer, who was familiar with every development of the case which startled the State 15 years ago, grew aggressively militant as he characterized as absolutely false the declaration that the prosecution had offered settlement. He produced a letter he had written at the time, reciting the details of the settlement, which showed that counsel for Van Valkenburg had paid $8,000 to end the case. He further threatened Mr. Van Valkenburg that he would go into every detail of his record in 1896 if he persisted in declaring that the Commonwealth had made the move to drop the case.

SAYS HE COULD STILL CONVICT.

Mr. Whitehouse was seen at his home, and before he produced the settlement letter he said:

"If the settlement made by the defense did not suit Mr. Van Valkenburg, why in 15 years has he not asked that the nolle-pros be stricken off the record and insist on a verdict in his favor of not guilty?

"I believe that there are enough witnesses still living to convict him. They are scattered over the country, and it would take time to get them. But if I could get them and Mr. Van Valkenburg would consent to a new trial, I would give him a hard shake for his white alley.

"I still think he is guilty, and if it is possible to get the witnesses we could convict him. Why, if the chief witness for the Commonwealth is dead and convicted of perjury as Mr. Van Valkenburg says, does he not ask for an opening of the case and a verdict of not guilty?

"If they insist on saying that the proposition for a settlement came from our side, I shall write a history of the case, give details, and relate circumstances never publicly known. I repeat, and counsel for Van Valkenburg dare not deny, that friends and counsel for Van Valkenburg pleaded for a settlement. No such proposition was ever made by us at any time.

"If Van Valkenburg was not guilty, why did he permit his counsel and friends to allow a nolle-pros to be entered and consent to the heavy cost payment? If he was not guilty, why does he not have the record changed since he says our material witness is dead? An innocent man never allows the costs to be paid and an honest man would insist upon the record being changed to not guilty even after these 15 years.

CHALLENGES VAN VALKENBURG.

"It is true that Gibson, one of our witnesses, got into the clutches of the law, such as did Rosenthal and his crowd in New York. He was not our material witness. If Van Valkenburg thought so, why did he allow a settlement?

"I defy Mr. Van Valkenburg to ask that the record be changed and a new trial started. If he does and gives us time to get our witnesses, I am confident that we can convict him of the true bill returned by the grand jury in this county in 1897."

Mr. Whitehouse then produced a letter he wrote on November 26, 1897, reciting the terms and manner of the settlement. This letter was sent to a citizen, who complained that the settlement was subversive of justice, and is as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 24th instant, I would say that while it is true the case of the Commonwealth v. Van Valkenburg has been settled, it is not true that I or anyone whom I represented contributed one dollar toward a settlement.

"On the night of the 15th of November, the case having been fixed for trial on the following day, I was paid the sum of $8,000 for the purpose of defraying all costs, comprising those of lawyers, detectives, and others employed on behalf of the Commonwealth. On the following day the sum of $1,600 additional was paid in the court of quarter sessions as costs, witness fees, and court charges. I was paid the $8,000 in the office of John F. Whalen, Esq., of Pottsville, of counsel for the defendant, who had sent for me. When I reached the office the only one present excepting myself was Maj. George W. Merrick, of Tioga County, to whom I was introduced by Mr. Whalen. There was some preliminary conversation, and then I was informed they were prepared to pay all costs on our agreeing to drop the prosecution. There was some talk about the kind of a receipt I should give. When this point was decided, Mr. Whalen and Mr. Merrick retired to an inner room. Presently Mr. Whalen came out with $8,000 in two large envelopes, the money being in crisp bank notes and all in $100 bills, if I remember right.

"Maj. Merrick had not previously appeared as counsel in the case, and I know of no connection he had therewith, except perhaps to bring the money to Pottsville and hand it over to us on behalf of those interested in having the case settled.

"If you have any information to the effect that the Commonwealth relented in the matter of the settlement of the case to the extent of $1, I will esteem it a favor if you will give me the name or names of your informant or informants, and I will guarantee he or they shall make a retraction full enough and complete enough to satisfy every doubt, if any exists, on the question. We had the evidence sufficiently strong to have secured the conviction of the defendant of the crime of bribery. We realized at the same time, however, that there were others behind him just as guilty as he was; and on this consideration, coupled with the further fact that he had suffered more than his share through the exposure following his arrest and indictment, we felt that the cause of justice would not suffer by letting off a small fish while other and bigger fish were beyond our reach. Such are the true facts regarding the settlement of this case. Where the money came from I leave to your own inference.

"Yours, truly, W. J. WHITEHOUSE."

John F. Whalen, mentioned in the letter as having paid the $8,000 in settlement, was seen at his home on Market Street and asked to confirm the statement of his client, Mr. Van Valkenburg.

"Did the Commonwealth offer to drop the case, as Mr. Van Valkenburg says?" was asked.

"I have nothing to say about the matter," was his reply.

"But you will not deny the statements made by Mr. Whitehouse as to the terms and manner of settlement he says were made by you as representing Mr. Van Valkenburg?"

"I must repeat that I will not discuss the case."

QUAY STOPPED PROSECUTION.

The story told here is to the effect that on the eve of the time scheduled for the trial, November 15, 1897, there was a long conference of the lawyers representing both sides. As a result of that conference and a telegram which Herman Barring, a detective employed by Quay, received, the case did not come to trial next day, and an agreement to nol-pros was made.

This telegram, according to counsel in the case, which came from Quay at St. Lucie, read:

"Let up."

Counsel in the case told the Public Ledger that fully $16,000 was required to pay all the costs in the case, including those of the defense. The money, counsel also said, was brought to Pottsville by the late John R. Williams, secretary for the late Congressman Connell, of Scranton.

SENATOR PENROSE'S CHARGES.

The rehearsing of the trial and some of the incidents connected therewith was brought about by the speech of Senator PENROSE in the Senate, relating to the Standard Oil check. Senator PENROSE said:

"Mr. E. A. Van Valkenburg, editor of the North American, in Philadelphia, was arrested and indicted for bribery in my first senatorial contest in 1896, and only escaped conviction through the leniency of Senator Quay and upon the payment of about $10,000 for costs for lawyers, detectives, and for other expenses of prosecution, which amount was paid by his attorney the day before the trial was set to take place."

The charge in question refers to an indictment found against Van Valkenburg by the court of quarter sessions of Schuylkill County, entered in the records as "No. 278, January sessions, 1897," when a bill of particulars was filed.

The preliminary trial of Van Valkenburg for this charge was held before Justice J. J. Kuebler at his office in Pottsville December 31, 1896. The prosecution was conducted by the district attorney of Schuylkill County, Edward W. Bechtel, and W. J. Whitehouse, both of Pottsville, and ex-Attorney General Henry W. Palmer and John T. Lenahan. The defense was conducted by District Attorney R. H. Koch, John F. Whalen, and Charles A. Snyder and H. C. Bergner, of Harrisburg.

Van Valkenburg was accused of attempting to bribe Webster C. Weiss, of Northampton County, and he was held by the squire in $1,500 bail for the action of the grand jury. He was indicted by the grand jury January 9, 1897. The case was called for trial in Pottsville September 14, 1897. His attorneys obtained at that time an order for a bill of particulars, which was filed, and that same day the counsel for the defense presented an affidavit to the court setting forth that F. A. Van Valkenburg, a brother of the defendant, was seriously ill in Pottsville and unable to appear to testify. On this plea the case was continued for two months until November, 1897.

W. J. Whitehouse, who was one of the attorneys for the prosecution, states that on the night of November 15, the day before the trial, he was paid the sum of $8,000 for the purpose of defraying all the costs of lawyers, detectives, and others employed on behalf of the Commonwealth, and on the following day the sum of nearly $1,600 additional was paid in the court of quarter sessions to defray witness fees and court charges. The counsel for the defense, J. F. Whalen, of Pottsville, made the payment of $8,000 to Mr. Whitehouse in the presence of George W. Merrick, of Tioga County, and thereupon Mr. Whitehouse states he authorized the proceedings against Van Valkenburg to be dropped.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess until 6 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to, and at the expiration of the recess (6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

Mr. SMOOT. Obviously there are very few Senators present. A good many of them have gone to dinner, and may not be back for some time. Therefore I move that the Senate take a further recess until 8.30 p. m.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8.30 p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

AMENDMENT OF ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 362) amending the Army appropriation bill was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the "act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," there be substituted for the word "hereafter," where it first occurs in the first proviso under the heading "Pay of Officers of the Line," the words "on and after December 15, 1912."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

F. E. WARREN,
JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr,
CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
THOMAS U. SISSON,
JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the committee of conference have been in session since 10 o'clock this morning continuously until a short time ago when they adjourned for refreshments. There seems to be some considerable difficulty in arriving at a complete agreement. I suppose the only course left open now is for me to move that the Senate shall further insist upon its amendments, that it request a conference on the part of the Senate with the House, and that the Presiding Officer shall name the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments, ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before that is finally disposed of, can not the Senator from Wyoming give to the Senate a general statement of what matters are still in dispute?

Mr. WARREN. Well, there are quite a number of them. I think the most formidable ones are the State claims of the four States; the legislation proposed for certain waterworks in Hawaii; the extra month's pay for employees of the Senate and House; the reimbursement of the subscribers to the Ellen Stone ransom; the Charlotte (N. C.) public building; the claim of Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller; the reenforcement against floods at Valdez, Alaska; the amendment regarding the Supervising Architect's Office which was proposed on the floor by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]; the Ute Indian judgment, of some $3,000,000; and one or two minor matters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. BOURNE, and Mr. CULBERSON conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

MEMORANDA RELATIVE TO BATTLESHIPS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] I ask that memoranda prepared by him be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It relates to the battleship which we have authorized, and he thinks it may be of some use to those interested in that subject. I am not asking to have it read, but simply that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memoranda.

1. England, Germany, and Japan possess fast battleships of at least 28-knot speed mounting as heavy guns as any battleships and protected by armor of from 7 to 9 inches in thickness, which is impenetrable at the battle ranges imposed by the latest torpedo; therefore these ships are equal for battle purposes to any slower battleship.

2. Slow battleships of the Dreadnought type are defenseless against torpedo attack at night or in a fog. (Admiral Bacon, p. 905 House Hearings; Lord Charles Beresford, p. 907; Admiral Twining, p. 907.)

3. Torpedo boats and destroyers are defenseless against fast battleships, which, having the same speed and greater radius of action, can overhaul and destroy them with their long-range batteries.

4. A slow battleship fleet, although possessing a large fleet of torpedo craft and auxiliaries, would be deprived of them as a preliminary step by an enemy possessing fast battleships, and therefore by (2) would be defenseless.

5. Slow battleships can not refuse battle, and therefore must be maneuvered in large fleets in order to be able to meet any force that may be concentrated against them.

6. A fleet of such ships dominates but little more sea area than a single fast battleship unit and is no menace to the movement of fast colliers or supply and troop ships, and therefore presents no opposition to invasion by sea, which is the prime function of a navy.

7. Our Navy possesses no fast battleships, therefore: (a) Our torpedo craft, supply ships, and colliers could be destroyed with immunity on the open sea by the fast battleships of either England, Germany, or Japan. (b) Our battleship fleets, being deprived of their necessary protectors, could be destroyed at night or in a fog by the torpedo boats of those countries. (c) If our fleets were sent out in the most defensible formation of "double line ahead," with our auxiliaries between the lines, the formation could be destroyed by fast battleships passing ahead of the lines and dropping mines or firing torpedoes into the path of our fleet, as shown by prize essay by Capt. J. A. Cuffe, page 909 House Hearings.

Therefore our Navy is defenseless and useless until it is provided with a sufficient number of fast battleships.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 226) for the appointment of three members of the Board of Managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was read twice by its title.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey objects. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ALASKA NORTHERN RAILWAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2534) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Northern Railway, and for other purposes, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the time for filing the map and maps of definite location of the Alaska Northern Railway, formerly known as the Alaska Central Railway, of its branches, station grounds, and terminal grounds, and junction and division terminals provided and required by the act entitled "An act for extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, both within and without reservations and withdrawals, be, and the same hereby is, extended until three years after the pasage of this act, and the time for completing the railway is hereby extended until two years after the filing of said maps; and leave is hereby granted to the Alaska Northern Railway Co., its successors and assigns, to file said map and maps of definite location within the time and the times therefor as above provided: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to have the effect of renewing or reviving any grant of title to real estate under the act of June 30, 1906, or any subsequent act which may have already lapsed or become forfeited: Provided further, That in case the United States shall at any time desire to acquire, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, said railroad, the extension herein made and the right of way secured thereby shall not be deemed or held to constitute any asset or value owned by said Alaska Northern Railway Co., its assigns or successors, above actual cost of the survey and locations thereof, as to any part of said right of way upon or over which said railroad shall not be actually constructed at the time of such purchase or condemnation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR—CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning first with House bills and then Senate bills, not to interfere, however, with conference reports.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Utah to withhold that request for a few moments.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the request, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I rise to a question in the nature of a question of personal privilege. A resolution has been introduced into the Senate—I refer to Senate resolution 386, introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]—to which amendments were offered when it was pending before the Senate by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I believe some of the amendments were adopted. I have been unable to get the copy of the amendments offered by the Senator from Washington, as they are not, I think, at the present time at the Secretary's desk, but I believe that the resolution was so amended as to include an investigation of the expenses of those who in the campaign of 1912 were candidates for the Presidency before either of the national conventions. That resolution, Mr. President, with either the amendments to which I have just referred adopted or with them pending, has gone to the calendar.

Mr. President, my name was presented to the Republican national convention at Chicago, and I received the votes of some of the delegates in that convention. I do not want that resolution to die upon the calendar for this session; and I feel such a personal interest in it and such a personal relation to it that I trust no Member of the Senate will object to unanimous consent for the passage of the resolution, so that the committee can go on with the investigation. I believe the public has a right to know all about the campaign expenses of candidates for office, and I do not, for one, wish to be put in the position, as a Member of this Senate, of sitting here without protest while a resolution for an investigation of campaign expenditures relating to a campaign in which I was a candidate goes to the calendar and to a position from which it can not be possibly rescued during this session, and, very likely, not during the next session, excepting by unanimous consent. I believe that that investigation should be made, and should be made now; and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution and pending amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 386——

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the resolution be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the statement made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, in the Senate on Wednesday, August 21, 1912, be, and is hereby, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, appointed under S. Res. 79, agreed to on April 29, 1912.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate fully into all statements and questions of fact referred to in the statement of personal privilege made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, on the floor of the Senate August 21, 1912, including all correspondence and financial transactions between John D. Archbold and Members of Congress and the United States Senate from 1900 to the date of the investigation; and further, said committee is authorized and directed to investigate into and ascertain the amount of money expended by or on behalf of any candidate seeking the nomination of any political party formed or in the process of formation for President during the year 1912, or by any committee or person acting for or on behalf of such candidate, or in the interest of such candidate or party; and to ascertain the names of all persons, firms, or corporations contributing to any of the purposes aforesaid, and the amounts paid or contributed, and how and when paid, including all sums of money used to secure the election of delegates to any national convention or to influence the actions of delegates at said convention.

Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, and to hold sessions at such place or places as may be deemed most convenient for the purposes of the inquiry; to employ an attorney, stenographers, and such other clerical force as may be deemed necessary; to subpœna witnesses; send for persons, books, records, and papers; and to administer oaths.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho objects.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to say that my objection is to the resolution as an entirety. I would not object to an opportunity being given to the Senator from Wisconsin so far as his participation in the campaign was concerned; but the resolution, unfortunately for the Senator from Wisconsin, is so broad and comprehensive in its scope as to open up a subject that, in my judgment, would be sensational and would develop into a dragnet for the purpose of bringing into the investigation and the report of the committee a mass of extraneous matter that could under no circumstances be proper for the consideration of the people of the country at a time such as we are now confronted with. I therefore object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not know that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is now engaged in investigating the campaign expenditures of the presidential and the congressional campaigns of 1904 and 1908? This body has already sanctioned and approved such an investigation with regard to the campaigns of 1904 and 1908, and the pending resolution simply extends that investigation to the campaign of 1912. I do not see why that is more objectionable than the investigation regarding the campaign expenditures of 1904 and 1908.

I do remember that some amendments to this resolution have been offered and are now pending to investigate campaign expenditures back to 1890; but the Senate has not yet adopted those amendments; the whole matter is in the control of the Senate; and the Senate can limit this proposed investigation in the same way as the investigation which it has already authorized has been limited. I hope that the Senator from Idaho will withdraw his objection and let the resolution come up for consideration. The Senate can then fix the scope of it in such way as to free it from the objections which the Senator has made to it. I make it a personal matter with the Senator from Idaho in so far as I am permitted to, and ask him to withdraw his objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, earlier in the day I expressed myself at some length in regard to this proceeding. In my judgment it is inappropriate at this time, or at any time, to enter upon what to me seems to be a sensational investigation covering campaigns that have long since closed and the transactions of men, some of whom are dead, and I can not see that any good purpose would be served by it.

The Senator from Wisconsin is interested principally in the existing campaign, and it is not reasonable to appeal to me on personal grounds in favor of a resolution that not only comprehends the existing campaign in which he is interested but which undertakes to bring under investigation transactions concerning the campaigns of 1904 and 1908. I am not unmindful of the fact that a committee of the Senate is now engaged in the investigation of certain charges specified and limited by the language of the resolution under which that committee is acting. I would deplore the extension of the scope of that investigation so that it might operate as a dragnet in which to draw not only before the attention of the Senate but before the attention of the country allegations of misconduct and alleged violations of law by men who are before the American people for their indorsement for the high office of President. It is better that the country should be given a rest from this agitation. The attention of the people had better be directed to a consideration of the men who have been nominated, from a personal standpoint, as to their fitness for the office to which they aspire, and more especially to the political issues involved.

I want to see the campaign carried on upon principles and a consideration of principles rather than upon a consideration and determination of the propriety of the action of men in a contest that is closed. The contest for the nomination is closed. It had better remain closed until some future time—if it is to be opened at all—when the public mind will be settled and free from the rancor and prejudice and the extreme feeling that characterized that contest. I must insist upon my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho insists on his objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may be permitted to say just this word, I suppose I can say nothing to the Senator from Idaho that will move him from his purpose; but I will say to him that the denial of an investigation here will not quiet, allay, or abate the public interest in this subject. The very fact that the Senate does not pass this resolution will stimulate the imagination of all men with respect to what the Senate is trying to withhold from them by preventing this investigation.

But, Mr. President, for my own part if I can do nothing else, if I can not prevail upon the Senator from Idaho, and if this matter must be blocked here at this point by the refusal to give unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution, it occurs to me that a motion to take up the resolution is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution is in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 386.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I was recognized, and I yielded to the Senator for a question of personal privilege. I did not yield to bring up any question before the Senate other than the matter of personal privilege.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator was recognized for unanimous consent. I object to his request for unanimous consent to take up the calendar. And I will ask the Chair to put the question on my motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, notwithstanding the objection offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the calendar under Rule VIII, and upon that motion the Senator from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the motion be stated again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the calendar under Rule VIII. House bills to be first considered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I may have misunderstood, but I understood the Chair a moment ago to rule that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin was in order, that the Senator had a right to raise the question of consideration upon his motion instead of being compelled to wait to raise it upon the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That opinion of the Chair was rendered upon the supposition that the Senator from Wisconsin was entitled to the floor, but it developed that the Senator from Utah yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin for a personal explanation, and the Senator from Utah did not lose the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I be pardoned for one more parliamentary inquiry? Did the Senator from Utah yield for a question of personal privilege, or did he yield that unanimous consent might be asked?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asked unanimous consent, and the Senator from Wisconsin asked him to withhold that request that he might present a question in the nature of a personal privilege.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I should like to make this point and let the Chair pass upon it, that although the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin was not a point of personal privilege, it is a point of the very highest privilege, going to the integrity of the body of which we are Members, and for that reason it was in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would feel constrained——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Minnesota will permit the Chair, the Chair would feel constrained to overrule that point of order.

Mr. NELSON. I want to speak about the point of order a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is disposed of.

Mr. NELSON. This is what I rose to submit: It may be the practice in the House, but it is not in the Senate. A Senator can not by yielding the floor to another Senator prescribe for what purpose and limit it. If a Senator surrenders the floor to another Senator, it is unconditional. I know no rule under which a Senator yielding the floor to another Senator can limit it.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not yield the floor. I yielded for a question, and that question was in the shape of a personal privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I just want to correct the statement of the Senator from Utah. I asked him to yield to me, and after he yielded to me I stated that I rose to state a question in the nature of a question of personal privilege. That is the fact about it, as the RECORD will show.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion of the Senator from Utah. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah, which is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, House bills to be first considered.

Mr. SMOOT. Not to interfere with conference reports.

Mr. POINDEXTER. A quorum being present, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further calling of the roll and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 386.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can not be done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further call of the roll and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of Senate resolution 386.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BORAH. Is a motion in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion is in order.

Mr. BORAH. I move that we take up the unobjected House bills on the calendar and proceed with their consideration, and that, as soon as they are disposed of, it be followed by this resolution, and that it be voted upon before 10.30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first part of the Senator's motion is precisely the motion now before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The second part is not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second part is not. The Chair has some doubt whether that compound motion can be made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho will state his motion.

Mr. BORAH. The motion is that we proceed with the consideration of unobjected House bills upon the calendar, and that as soon as they are disposed of we proceed with the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is that all of the motion?

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator why limit it to House bills on the calendar? Why not proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. BORAH. For the reason that if we do that we would not get to that resolution at all, and it is necessary to get the House bills disposed of in order to get them acted upon.

COOSA RIVER DAM, ALA.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 949).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion, the Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill No. 7343:

To authorize the building of a dam across the Coosa River, Ala., at the place selected for Lock No. 18 on said river.

This bill presents a typical case of a river where its development by the Federal Government for navigation should go hand in hand with its development for water power. The reports of the engineers show that comprehensive plans have been made by the Corps of Engineers for the development of navigation on this river by a series of dams constructed for the purpose of creating deep pools. This bill seeks to authorize the construction of one of these dams through a private agency, the Alabama Power Co., which intends to use the water power created for commercial purposes. If the Federal Government chose to build this dam itself in aid of navigation, its right to the water power incidentally created by the dam would be beyond question. When, instead of building the dam itself, it builds it by an agent, as proposed by this bill, I believe it to be equally clear that the dam and all its incidents, including the water power created, is within the regulative power of the Federal Government in respect to navigation.

It is said that the grantee, the Alabama Power Co., proposes to spend over a million dollars in the construction of the dam, as well as to furnish toward the project its riparian rights, and to stand the expense and cost of the damages by flowage. It is manifestly entitled to be credited for all these expenditures, and is manifestly entitled to a fair, full, and reasonable profit for its investment and work. But, after all of these items are fully allowed for, it is equally manifest that in the course of time the return from the privilege thus granted in the shape of valuable water power created may far exceed a reasonable return for these items.

No provision is made in the bill whereby the Secretary of War may, in granting the permit, exact such compensation as in the course of time may prove to be necessary to equalize this account. I think this is a fatal defect in the bill, and that is is just as improvident to grant this permit without such a reservation as it would be to throw away any other asset of the Government. To make such a reservation is not depriving the States of anything that belongs to them. On the contrary, in the Report of the Secretary of War it is recommended that all compensation for similar privileges should be applied strictly to the improvement of navigation in the respective streams—a strictly Federal function. The Federal Government, by availing itself of this right, may in time greatly reduce the swollen expenditures for river improvements which now fall wholly upon the general taxpayer. I deem it highly important that the Nation should adopt a consistent and harmonious policy of treatment of these water-power projects which will preserve for this purpose their value to the Government whose right it is to grant the permit. The necessity for the adoption of such a policy has recently been pointed out, with my approval, by the Secretary of War, and I see no reason why this bill should be exempted from the safeguards which have been recommended by him in the cases of other bills now pending before Congress.

I therefore return the bill to your honorable body without my approval.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 24, 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. BANKHEAD. At this late hour of the session, Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will state his point of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I make the point of order that the regular order is the calling of the roll upon the pending motion of the Senator from Utah, and this interruption is out of order, and that certainly no remarks upon the veto message which has just been read would be in order or any motion to dispose of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that, inasmuch as the roll call was not proceeding, a message from the President of the United States is a matter of privilege; and the Chair is further of the opinion that no discussion is to be had upon it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was about to say that at this late hour——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am compelled to interrupt the Senator from Alabama. Without any disposition to be discourteous, I must demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the message of the President, which has just been read, is the regular order at the present time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would inquire if the Chair thinks the message is now open to debate pending the roll call upon the motion of the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hold that some disposition can properly be made of the message. If the Senator will permit the Chair for one moment, I think it will be disposed of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to be captious.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss the message of the President at this late hour, and I ask that it lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON. With the consent of the Senator from Alabama, or if he has no objection, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope my friend will not insist upon that motion.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Senator from Alabama objection to that course?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should prefer to have it lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that the message and the bill lie upon the table. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Constitution says the message being received, the House receiving it shall proceed to determine the question whether or not the bill shall pass, notwithstanding the veto of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is competent for the Senate to dispose of the message at its pleasure, and that the request of the Senator from Alabama is in order. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the message will lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; if the Senator will permit the Chair for a moment to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

CORBETT TUNNEL PROJECT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator in his right can make that motion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the joint resolution went to the other House and was there amended so that the money to pay these claims should be paid out of the general reclamation fund, but not taxable to any particular project. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I want to say that there are three or four nominations that ought to be disposed of to-night. It will take but three or four minutes to dispose of them, and then we can go back into legislative session. This will not displace the matter that the Senator from Wisconsin has in charge.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order pending a roll call upon the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is in order at any stage of the proceedings, and he will put the motion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, pending my right to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, I inquire in what position that will leave the pending motion and the order for a roll call upon it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In precisely the same position that it is now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At the conclusion of the executive session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will; and the Chair will ask that the roll shall be called upon the motion of the Senator from Utah at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well; I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes in executive session the doors were reopened.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. MCCUMBER. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Utah on the table.

Mr. BACON. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII, House bills to be first considered. The Senator from North Dakota moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Utah on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 386.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 386.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If there are any pending amendments, I should like to have them stated.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I would suggest that as some amendments have already been adopted, the resolution be first read as amended, and then there will probably be other amendments offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as it has been amended, and the amendments will likewise be stated separately, so that they may be fully considered.

The Secretary read the resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the statement made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, in the Senate on Wednesday, August 21, 1912, be, and is hereby, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof appointed under S. Res. 79, agreed to on April 29, 1912.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate fully into all statements and questions of fact referred to in the statement of personal privilege made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], on the floor of the Senate, August 21, 1912, including all correspondence and financial transactions between John D. Archbold and Members of Congress and the United States Senate, from 1900 to the date of the investigation; and further, said committee is authorized and directed to investigate into and ascertain the amount of money expended by or on behalf of any candidate seeking the nomination of any political party formed or in the process of formation for President during the year 1912, or by any committee or person acting for or on behalf of such candidate, or in the interest of such candidate or party; and to ascertain the names of all persons, firms, or corporations contributing to any of the purposes aforesaid, and the amounts paid or contributed, and how and when paid, including all sums of money used to secure the election of delegates to any national convention or to influence the actions of delegates at said convention.

Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, and to hold sessions at such place or places as may be deemed most convenient for the purposes of the inquiry; to employ an attorney, stenographers, and such other clerical force as may be deemed necessary; to subpœna witnesses; send for persons, books, records, and papers; and to administer oaths.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments already agreed to will be separately stated, so that there will be a full understanding.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think I can explain them very briefly to the Senate. The resolution as originally offered and modified by me embraces that portion from line 1 to line 7, inclusive. The remainder of the resolution was added on motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], with the exception of an amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] relating to the correspondence of Mr. Archbold and the employment of an attorney, which amendments were adopted this morning. I believe that is a statement of the situation, is it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. My attention was diverted during the last part of the Senator's statement.

Mr. PENROSE. I stated to the Senate that the resolution as finally modified by me is embraced in the printed copy which I hold from line 1 to line 7. The remainder of the resolution, from line 8 to line 21, on page 2, is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Then, there were two additional amendments not in this print, but read by the Secretary, one referring to the investigation of the correspondence of John D. Archbold with Members of Congress, and the other relating to the employment of an attorney.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is correct.

Mr. PENROSE. Those two amendments of the Senator from Washington have been adopted, but I offered an amendment to that amendment, which the Senate has not yet acted on and which I will ask the Secretary now to read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania really is to the resolution as amended by the amendments already adopted, as I understand.

Mr. PENROSE. The amendment which I now ask the Secretary to read is to the resolution as amended, the amendments having been adopted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the name "John D. Archbold" it is proposed to insert "and George W. Perkins and Col. Theodore Roosevelt."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I also ask to have the word "reputable" inserted before the word "attorney." I should like to have that amendment adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to strike out the words "an attorney" and in lieu to insert "reputable attorneys."

Mr. BAILEY. Who is to decide that?

Mr. PENROSE. The committee. I ask for a vote first on the Perkins and Roosevelt amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. After the name "John D. Archbold" it is proposed to insert "and George W. Perkins and Col. Theodore Roosevelt."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I want to inquire if the amendment is inserted at the right place, according to the intentions of the Senator from Pennsylvania? I do not understand that we want to inquire into all correspondence between Col. Roosevelt and Members of Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. That is just what I want to get at.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not pertinent to the subject of the inquiry that he had correspondence with Members of Congress on thousands of subjects.

Mr. PENROSE. Supposing there were inclosures in those letters?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course I have no objection to it, but it is entirely irrelevant.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the paragraph be read now with my amendment in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paragraph covering the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Including all correspondence and financial transactions between John D. Archbold and George W. Perkins, and Col. Theodore Roosevelt and Members of Congress and the United States Senate from 1900 to the date of the investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, let the Secretary read the amendment relative to attorneys.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, after the word "employ," it is proposed to strike out "an attorney," and to insert "reputable attorneys."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like the Secretary to read the whole paragraph relating to attorneys.

The Secretary read as follows:

Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate or during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, and to hold sessions at such place or places as may be deemed most convenient for the purposes of the inquiry; to employ reputable attorneys, stenographers, and such other clerical force as may be deemed necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Before the question is put I should like to add there "and the parties to the examination may likewise be represented by attorneys."

Mr. BAILEY. That would be in the discretion of the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. It is just as well to have it in the resolution, I think, that any parties to the examination may be represented by attorneys if they so desire.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as to this matter in reference to attorneys, I understand the amendment has already been adopted, has it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, I want to be heard upon it, if that amendment has not been adopted. I thought that it had been adopted yesterday.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was an amendment adopted yesterday.

Mr. McCUMBER. Relating to attorneys?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Authorizing the committee to appoint an attorney.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to oppose that part of the resolution. If it has already been adopted, I shall have to move to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Pennsylvania offered an amendment in lieu of the amendment providing for the employment of an attorney. Is the Chair correct?

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to modify that amendment, however, in order to put it in a little better phraseology. I move to insert that "the persons under investigation may be represented by attorneys."

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the proposed amendment read and read in connection with the remainder of the resolution, so that we may understand it.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota if he will permit the amendment to be adopted, then the question will be on agreeing to the resolution as amended, and the Senator will have an opportunity to speak on it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will take the opportunity now, I believe.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from North Dakota is about to proceed with debate, will he yield to me to make a conference report?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield. I suppose the Senator has the right, of course, without calling on me to yield.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and adheres to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and adhering to its disagreements to the amendments of the Senate numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 9, 10, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 25, 28, 32, 35, 39, 43, 44, 46, 50, 52, 57, 59, 62, 65, 73, 76, 77, 82, 83, 85, 98, 99, 111, 112, 113, and 129.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$21,349.95"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$11,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$13,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum last named in said amendment insert "$10,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the word "Kansas" in the last line of said amendment insert the following: "payable out of any money in the Treasury belonging to the Pottawatomie Indians"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the end of the matter inserted by said amendment the following: ", and at a rate per square foot of available floor space not exceeding 40 cents"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 5 and 6 of said amendment, strike out the following: "to continue available during the fiscal year 1913"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114, the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

F. E. WARREN,
JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
THOMAS U. SISSON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the report is that of disagreement, the disagreement being as to four items; that is to say, as to four numbers, but in reality five items. One of the items is the amount for repayment to the States of Virginia and Maryland, $192,000; the other is to pay the State of Texas $217,693.39; the other is to pay the State of Oregon $193,543.02, amounting altogether to $603,236.41; also the amendment providing for the payment of an extra month's pay to the clerks and employees of the Senate and House.

I understand from the message from the House that they have considered this disagreement on that side, and while I did not hear it read, I think they have sent us a message announcing that they adhere to their disagreement.

Mr. President, I believe, and the Chair will correct me if I am wrong, that the motions now in order would be for the Senate to recede, or for the Senate to adhere, or possibly to insist upon its amendments, and ask for a further conference.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator what will be the effect if the Senator refuses to accede. Would not that throw the whole bill back into conference, together with the other amendments already agreed to?

Mr. WARREN. How is that?

Mr. OVERMAN. Would it not throw the whole bill back—those amendments which they have agreed to and those upon which there is still a disagreement?

Mr. WARREN. The whole bill, of course, would go to conference, the idea being that if the report is agreed to it would be a closed matter except as to the items in disagreement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as I understand, if the Senate adopts the conference report the situation would be as the Senator from Wyoming has described it. If, however, the Senate should reject the report, it would leave the whole matter still in dispute.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. The Senate can now accept the report of the conferees, which will effect the agreement as stated as to all the items except those which are still in disagreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, in the first instance, is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is a motion in order to reject the report and send the bill back to the conferees?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Agreement to a motion to refuse to accept the report would send it back.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand, a vote "nay" on the question of agreeing to the report would be the equivalent of rejecting it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Precisely. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" appear to have it. [A pause.] The "ayes" have it.

Mr. STONE. Does that mean that it goes back to conference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not necessarily.

Mr. BACON. Did the Chair announce the result? There was scarcely an opportunity for Senators to interpose anything.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it, and then, after a pause, that the ayes had it.

Mr. OVERMAN. That means to adopt the conference report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the effect of that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Merely to agree upon the amendments which have been agreed upon between the conferees of the two Houses.

Mr. WARREN. It means an agreement as far as the conferees have agreed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would a motion to reject the conference report be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not.

Mr. STONE. Would a motion to recede from the amendments in disagreement be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be in order.

Mr. STONE. I understand the matters of difference relate to the claims of four States and the provision inserted by the Senate for an extra allowance of one month's pay to the clerks of the House and the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. The clerks and employees of the House and the Senate.

Mr. STONE. The clerks and employees. Those amendments constitute the difference between the two Houses. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. STONE. Just to test the sense of the Senate, I move that the Senate recede.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate recede from the amendments that are in disagreement.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution authorizing a committee of three Members, to be appointed by the Chair, to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the session and are ready to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

House resolution 709.

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States to inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn unless the President has some communication to make to them.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will occupy a very few moments of the time of the Senate.

I was greatly surprised that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] should make the motion he has made. It does seem to me that the honest debts of the Government ought to be paid.

The four State claims which will be excluded if the motion of the Senator from Missouri prevails are just demands against the Government of the United States. I have heard no facts alleged and no argument made showing that the Government does not owe these amounts, in the aggregate some six hundred thousand dollars.

The amendments were in order. There were some complaints that while the claims ought to be paid they ought not to be paid on the general deficiency bill. From the parliamentary standpoint these amendments were in order on the general deficiency bill. Therefore this general deficiency bill is the very place where the payment of those claims ought to be provided for.

If the Government owes the money, and if the proposition to pay the money is in order on this bill, why should not the payment be provided for on the general deficiency bill? Why this picking and choosing as to the particular bill on which an honest debt of the Government should be paid?

It seems to me it is in order always for the Government to pay its honest debts. If you would practice a little more of that virtue, these debts would not accumulate and be constantly coming here to occupy the time of the Senate.

The Government, as an individual, should meet its liabilities and pay its debts. There rests on the Government a moral obligation of the very highest nature, higher, if possible, than can be that of an individual, to meet its liabilities, to discharge its obligations.

In addition to that, Mr. President, it has been the custom of Congress to provide for claims of this sort on the general deficiency bill. There are many others provided and which will be paid under this bill.

Is there any reason why there should be an exception made? Why should these be excluded from payment? There is no reason, so far as I know, except the whims and peculiarities and idiosyncracies of certain gentlemen who have seen fit to stand as an obstacle and a barrier to prevent the Government from acting fairly and justly and honestly with its creditors. I am sick and tired of coming here and asking the Congress of the United States to pay this obligation to the State of Virginia. It is absolutely just. It is absolutely meritorious. It has been neglected until it is a shame and a disgrace to the Government that it should be as it is.

The claim of the State of Maryland is equally as meritorious and as just. The claim of the State of Texas and the claim of the State of Oregon are all just claims. There has been no contention against, there has not been a word uttered in the Senate against, the moral obligation of the Government to pay these debts or against the justice and righteousness of these claims.

The only other item which seems to have been excluded is a little pittance of a month's extra pay to the employees of the Senate and the House who have been toiling here for the last nine months. I am not surprised that those who are unwilling to see the Government discharge its moral obligations, who are not willing to see the Government pay its debts, should begrudge to the faithful and useful employees the additional month's pay which is ordinarily voted to them by the Congress. It is true it is not a debt on the part of the Government, but it is a just recognition of faithful service and a generosity which has heretofore been extended and ought to be extended now.

As far as I am concerned, I think we ought to make a stand in this matter. We ought to assert our right to see that the Government acts honestly, to see that it discharges its obligation. We hear talk about waiting and putting it on another bill. Why wait for some other time? When can there ever be a better time than now to do what is right, to do what is honest, to discharge an obligation which exists?

I sincerely hope that the motion of the Senator from Missouri will be defeated. I sincerely hope the Senate is not ready to say that it will refuse to pay the honest obligations of the Government and that it is not ready to refuse the little generosity of a month's extra pay to the employees of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I hope the motion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will not be adopted, and the reason why I hope the motion will not be adopted rests upon my absolute knowledge that the claim presented by the State of Texas in this instance is a just one and ought to be paid in this particular appropriation bill.

The claims of Oregon, Virginia, and Maryland will be presented by Senators from those States. I will naturally confine myself to a statement of the claim of Texas.

The Federal Constitution declares that the United States shall protect each State against invasion, and that is the broad ground upon which this claim of Texas is founded. In 1859 and 1860, in order to resist the invasion of Mexican banditti, among others those under Cortina, and the incursions of Indians from the northeastern border of Texas, the State, through Gov. Houston, was compelled to organize special ranger forces for the protection of the State against invasion from Mexico and from the Indians in the Territory. Such claims as these have been recognized immemorially by the Federal Government as just claims against that Government, and in many instances have been paid. Even prior to 1905 claims of this character were promptly adjusted and paid.

Coming to this particular claim, in 1905 an amendment was adopted on the general deficiency appropriation bill of that year which provided that the Secretary of War should investigate and report to Congress what amount of money had been expended by the State between certain years named for the special purposes to which I have referred. The Secretary of War in January, 1906, reported that in round figures $375,000 had been so expended by the State, and Congress appropriated in the general deficiency bill of 1906 $375,000 to reimburse the State for this expenditure. He also reported that subsequent to the dates named in the act about $21,000 additional was expended by the State.

In 1908, again under a general deficiency bill such as this, an appropriation of this additional amount of about $21,000 was made and paid to the State.

Now, it turned out, as was discovered in 1908, after the last payment was made, that a still further amount had been expended by Texas prior to the Civil War for the general purposes to which I have called attention, and the Secretary of War in February of this year made a supplemental report under the provision of the general deficiency bill of 1905, after consulting the Judge Advocate General, to the general effect that about $217,000 in addition had been expended by the State in defense of the frontier.

The original vouchers for practically all of this last expenditure were found in the débris of the comptroller's office at Austin, rescued from the fire which destroyed the State capitol in 1881, the original vouchers showing that this amount of money had been expended by the State during these years, under the governorship of Sam Houston. They were presented to the Secretary of War, and on the strength of those original vouchers he reported to Congress as I have indicated, in February, 1912, the additional sum of $217,000 as having been expended.

Mr. President, following the precedents which I have pointed out as to the bill on which such claims should be placed, this claim of $217,000 was presented to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to be included in this general deficiency appropriation bill. Following the course of the Senate on the subject, since 1895, at least, and acquiesced in by the House, it was adopted by the subcommittee, by the full committee, by the Senate itself, and was then rejected by the House conferees.

I will not enter into what was said in conference, but I do feel impelled to say generally to the Senate that the House conferees refused to consider the question whether this was a just claim against the Federal Government. It had been audited from original vouchers by the Secretary of War, who represented the Government of the United States. The report of the committee was based upon the original vouchers issued by the State and paid by it. Yet for reasons into which I will not go, even the consideration of this claim of Texas was denied, some of the conferees of the House saying that they had not even read the report of the Secretary of War which had been submitted to Congress in February, 1912.

I submit, Mr. President, that this is a meritorious and a just claim, that it is half a century old, that it has been audited by an officer of the United States, and that it is based upon original vouchers. I want it specially understood that this claim does not rest upon the unstable memory of man, but it is based upon the primary vouchers which are in the archives at Austin and which have been exhibited to and examined by the War Department.

So far as this claim of Texas is concerned, I insist that it would be unjust to adopt the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate recede upon that item.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a year or two ago in the Senate I heard a distinguished Senator from Maine suggest that it was improper for a claimant against the Government of the United States to employ an attorney to represent him in the collection of a claim against the Government. My experience in the few years I have been here is that attorneys representing a claim against the Government, assisted not only by the Senators from a State but by the Representatives of the State as well, are unable sometimes to secure justice to be done by the Government of the United States to those whom the Government justly owes. In proof of that fact, Mr. President, I am going to refer to the record in presenting the merits of the claim of my State against the Government of the United States.

It is improper for me, Mr. President, to animadvert upon any Members of the House of Representatives in reference to this or any other matter that has come up for the consideration of the Senate, but it has seemed to me in the discharge of the duties I have had to discharge in connection with claims against the Government of the United States that some of the Members on the other side insist that no additions to any appropriation bill or supply bill which are made by the Senate of the United States are entitled to any consideration or to any credit whatever.

I think the time has arrived when this body, representing a coordinate branch of the Government of the United States, ought to insist upon its rights and say that the amendments which they suggest, which are just and which are supported by the evidence and by the facts, ought to be retained in these appropriation bills, and ought at least to receive the same fair consideration that any other claim which is presented to the consideration of any branch of Government receives.

With reference to this particular claim, Mr. President, it is not a stale claim. It is a claim that the State of Oregon has been insisting upon ever since it was incurred in 1864.

The amendment which was adopted by the Senate to the deficiency appropriation bill for the relief of the State of Oregon was for the sum of $193,543.02, as a reimbursement for moneys paid out by the State during the years 1864 to 1867 for the expenses incident to raising volunteers who served from 1864 to 1867 in Oregon, Idaho, Washington, and northern Nevada against hostile Indians. These volunteers were raised by the State at the specific request of the Secretary of War, by authority of President Lincoln, and the particular items of expense making up this amount were incurred by the State at the urgent solicitation of the general commanding the Department of the Pacific.

Mr. President, I dislike to detain the Senate with this matter, because I know it is early in the morning and Senators are anxous to get away from here, but so long as I am in the Senate I propose to insist upon the payment of this claim, and, consuming as little time as I do, I promise you that I propose to consume whatever time is necessary to submit this claim of the people of the State of Oregon to the Senate of the United States and to the people of the country and to show the injustice which has been perpetrated against my State as well as the injustice which has been perpetrated against these other States in the rejection of just claims against the Government, and I do not think I owe any apology to the Senate for the time I propose to consume to-night if it takes me until daylight to do it.

This claim was originally filed by the State under the act of July 27, 1861, to authorize the reimbursement of States for expenses incurred in raising volunteers during the Civil War. It was then filed in the sum of $390,820.10. On November 3, 1884, the Third Auditor recommended its transfer to the Secretary of War, stating that in his judgment it did not come within the provisions of the act of July 27, 1861, but should be considered by the Secretary of War for adjudication under the act of June 27, 1882, to reimburse certain States and Territories for expenses incurred in certain Indian wars.

We find in that early day the departments of the Government bandying this claim back from one department to another, just as the committees of Congress have been bandying the claim from one committee to another, and every time for the purpose of defeating a just and an honest claim due from the Government of the United States to the State of Oregon.

On November 12, 1887, the Secretary of War returned the case to the Secretary of the Treasury, holding that the expenses were not within his jurisdiction to pay under the act of 1882; holding, further, that they came under the provisions of the act of July 27, 1861, authorizing the Treasury to make such payment.

On March 10, 1888, the third auditor completed an examination and audit of the claim, and in his report submitted to the second comptroller on that date made a statement of allowances and differences, showing that the total amount claimed by the State, to wit, $390,820.10, had been disbursed by the State in connection with its Indian wars, and was necessitated by the withdrawal of the United States troops from that country, but recommending in a letter of the same date to the second comptroller the conclusion that the claims did not come within the scope or intention of the indemnity act of July 27, 1861. This conclusion was approved by the Hon. Sigourney Butler, second comptroller.

On February 27, 1889, a Senate resolution was adopted directing the Secretary of War, through a bureau which had been established in his department, known as the "Board of War Claims Examiners," appointed under section 2 of the act of August 14, 1886, to audit the accounts of the State of Oregon for the suppression of Indian hostilities at the time of the Civil War, and to ascertain and report to Congress the amount of moneys actually expended for these purposes.

Under this authority the claim was again audited, and an itemized account was certified to the Senate by the Secretary of War aggregating in three items a total of $355,152.88.

That was a second adjudication by the Government of the United States, showing the justice of the claim of the State of Oregon against the United States.

The three items thus certified by the Secretary of War were, first, extra pay to volunteers; second, amounts paid to secure volunteers; and, third, militia expenses.

Appropriations to pay the amount thus certified by the Secretary of War passed the Senate on three occasions as amendments to deficiency bills.

So we see that this claim, which is now included in this bill, passed the Senate three times before this occasion.

In one instance when the general deficiency bill was being considered by the Senate, on March 5, 1891, the appropriation for the amount stated by the Secretary of War, and which had passed the Senate, was not retained in the bill by the conference committee. When the conference report was submitted to the Senate Senator Stewart, of Nevada, objected to the report of the committee, and in reply to his objections Senator Hale, who was in charge of the report, stated:

I want to say to the Senator from Nevada—I know that he is a reasonable man upon all these subjects—that the Senate is committed to these State claims by vote and by sentiment, and it is only a question of time when they will pass.

In this connection it may be noted that the following year Senator Stewart secured a special provision for the settlement of the Nevada State claim, appropriation for which has been made. (See act of May 27, 1902, 32 Stat. L., 325.)

Mr. President, I desire to say that the Nevada claim was on all fours with the claim of the State of Oregon against the United States.

On account of the failure to secure the appropriation for the amount reported by the Secretary of War, principally because of the fact that it included items for extra pay, which were regarded by some as a gratuity to volunteers in the State service, the whole case was referred to the Court of Claims for decision by Senate resolution adopted June 28, 1906. Under this resolution the State presented its claim for the entire amount for which it had been originally presented. The first reference being defective, a second resolution was passed on May 29, 1908, ratifying the previous reference. The case was brought to a hearing on November 27, 1908, as a result of which findings were filed, which were certified to the Senate on April 30, 1909, and are printed as Senate Document No. 28, Sixty-first Congress, first session.

Mr. President, I call your attention to this because it seems to me that the decisions of the constituted authorities of this Government ought to be entitled to some weight.

The decision of the Court of Claims was in favor of one branch of the claim, to wit, that including moneys necessarily and properly expended for the purpose of securing volunteers, consisting of several items aggregating $193,543.02. Upon the item for extra pay, aggregating $135,633.82, the court made an adverse finding, its conclusion being that this amount was a gratuity on the part of the State, and that the State has no claim legal or equitable against the United States on account thereof; in other words, the State of Oregon had paid a gratuity to the men who enlisted to fight the battles of the country and the Government of the United States decided that they were not entitled to that gratuity.

On the third item of the claim, that for expenses of militia, the court found that said militia was not mustered into the military service of the United States, and that the State has no valid claim for the reimbursement of its expenses in raising, supplying, and equipping same.

I call your attention to that, Mr. President, because we omit from our claim those last two items.

With respect to the item favorably decided by the Court of Claims, the court, in paragraphs 3 and 4, found the following facts:

1. That the volunteers in question were raised upon telegraphic call, under authority of the Secretary of War.

2. That on account of local conditions it was impossible for the State authorities to secure volunteers without making the payments in question.

In other words, that they could not get men to enlist in the Government service without paying them these gratuities which we abandoned in our claim.

3. That these payments were specifically requested by Brig. Gen. Alvord, commanding the district of Oregon and by the telegraphic request of Gen. Irwin McDowell, commanding the Department of the Pacific, and were authorized by act of the legislature of the State.

4. That the State, not having funds to make these payments, was forced to issue bonds bearing interest, which were redeemed during various years from 1867 to 1887, and that the State—necessarily and properly expended the following sums:

For principal, the sum of $129,041.02; for interest thereon, the sum of $43,868; and for advertising for the redemption of bonds before maturity, the sum of $481. The State also expended, in connection with the raising of said troops and the payment of bounty under said act, the sum of $153 for printing said bounty bonds, warrants, commissions, bounty certificates, and bond books, making a total expenditure under said bounty act on account of bounties paid the volunteers mustered into the United States service of $193,543.02, no part of which appears to have been repaid to it.

5. The court further found that the troops so organized were never engaged in the service of the United States in the suppression of the War of the Rebellion, but were engaged exclusively in the State of Oregon and adjacent Territories in the suppression of Indian outbreaks.

I call the Senate's attention to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury:

REPORT BY SECRETARY OF TREASURY UNDER ACT OF JUNE 25, 1910.

By the general deficiency act of June 25, 1910 (35 Stat., 777), the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to reopen, adjust, and audit the claims of the State of Oregon for expenses in raising its volunteer troops during the period of the Civil War, and to report to Congress on January 5, 1911—that is, during the present administration; for after this thing had been gone over by previous administrations the present administration reported on exactly the same plane—the Secretary of the Treasury submitted his report under this act, which report is printed as House Document No. 1265, Sixty-first Congress, third session.

In this report the amount found to have been expended by the State was $193,929.82, or $386.80 in excess of the amount found by the Court of Claims. A comparison of the items allowed by the Court of Claims with those reported by the Secretary of the Treasury shows that this difference arose in the counting of interest coupons on bonds, but in order that there may be no question about the matter, the pending bill—the amendment amending the deficiency bill—adopts the smaller amount, to wit, that allowed by the Court of Claims.

Mr. President, with reference to the authority of Congress for the adjustment and payment of these claims of the State of Oregon, while this case has been, after careful consideration, favorably determined by the Court of Claims in respect to the item which is the subject of the pending bill, it is deemed advisable to refer here to the precedents of congressional action in like cases, that there may be no misunderstanding of the considerations which authorize and direct the recognition and payment of this amount.

I think the same claim might be made with reference to the claim of Texas, and the same claim might be made with reference to the claim of Virginia, and the other claims which are objected to in conference.

The principle upon which the claim rests is that the duty of defending the States and affording to them adequate military protection rests primarily upon the Federal Government, and where a State is called upon to assume the duty thus described, the Federal Government is obliged by the Constitution to indemnify the State for all expenses necessarily so incurred. That applies particularly to the State of Texas. The only question in such cases relates to the matter of necessity. In respect to the pending claim, the findings of the Court of Claims in the first instance recite the facts showing that the payments made by the State were indispensable conditions precedent to the raising of the volunteers, and then specifically state that the amounts expended were necessarily paid.

An elaborate discussion of this subject is contained in the report submitted by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in connection with a similar claim of the State of Kansas. (S. Rept. No. 139, 46th Cong., 2d sess.) This report concludes as follows:

The General Government owes to the States the duty of protection, especially against the incursions of hostile savages, over whom the United States authorities have from the foundation of our Government exercised a kind of parental control. And this being the case, when, from any cause, the States are not given such protection, and reasonable and necessary expenses are incurred by such States in repelling invasions from the Indians and suppressing hostilities, reimbursement should be made for the same by the United States.

Also quoted in this report is the following extract from the report upon a similar claim of the State of California, an appropriation for the payment of which was made by the act of August 5, 1854. This quotation is as follows:

It is the opinion of this committee that the obligation of the Federal Government to furnish specific and particular defense to each several State is included in its obligation to maintain the "common defense" of the Confederacy. That invasions from abroad, insurrections at home, and aggressions from the savage tribes inhabiting our borders are alike within the protective province of the Federal Government. Congress possesses the exclusive power "to raise and support armies in time of peace," and possesses the power to call forth the militia "to suppress insurrections and repel invasions." In the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution the States stipulate that they will not "keep troops or ships of war in time of peace."

The conclusion necessarily follows that the Federal Government is by the implied, if not by the express, terms of the Federal compact bound.

The question here presented appears to have been distinctly raised in 1831 upon a claim presented by the State of Missouri. By act, approved March 3 of that year, Congress made an appropriation for the service of the Missouri Militia against the Indians, "provided that our Secretary of War shall, upon full investigation, be satisfied that the United States are liable for the payment of said militia under the second paragraph of the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States. (4 Stat. L., 466.)

Gen. Cass, then Secretary of War, examined the subject submitted and gave the opinion of the Government as to its constitutional obligations, affirming the liability of the Government and directing payment to be made to the State of Missouri.

It also quotes from a report submitted by Mr. Stanton, then a member of the House Committee on Military Affairs, in connection with a bill for the payment of a similar claim of the Territory of Utah. This quotation is as follows:

The liability of the Federal Government for necessary expenses incurred by the States and Territories in repelling invasions of their territory by a foreign enemy, or by hostile tribes of Indians within our borders, has been so often recognized that it can no longer be considered an open question.

This principle has been continued down to the last appropriation bills, and the only restriction placed upon either appropriation or direction for settlement has been that the expense should have been necessarily incurred.

The act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat. L., 613), directed the settlement of the claims for "expenses necessarily incurred" in the suppression of hostilities in Montana in 1867, "which have been examined and reported on by the inspector general, James A. Hardie; but in no case shall the sum allowed thereon be in excess of the award reported by said Gen. Hardie."

Gen. Hardie's report had been made under authority of the tenth section of the sundry civil act of 1870, providing as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the amount of expense necessarily incurred by the Territorial authorities of Montana for arms and supplies of the volunteer forces called out to suppress Indian hostilities in the Territory of Montana in the year 1867. * * * (Act of July 15, 1870, sec. 10; 16 Stat. L., 310.)

The act of February 20, 1874, provides for the settlement of expenses incurred by Dakota Territory in 1862, as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the amount of expense necessarily incurred by the Territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all expenses of the volunteer forces called out to suppress Indian hostilities in the Territory of Dakota in the year 1862, and report to Congress the names of the persons entitled to relief, together with a statement of the facts and sums upon which such report may be based. (18 Stat. L., 17.)

The act of March 3, 1881, providing for the payment of the Montana volunteers in the Nez Perces war, directs:

That each volunteer * * * shall be paid $1 per day during the term of such service, from the time that he left his home until he was returned thereto, including all time spent in hospital under treatment by such as received wounds or other injuries in such service. (21 Stat. L., 341.)

I dislike very much to tire the Senate of the United States with these quotations, but I insist that this claim is absolutely just and defendable not only by the acts of Congress, but by precedents which have been established by the Senate and by the Congress of the United States in the allowance of claims on all fours with the claim which the State of Oregon presents against the Government at this time.

By the acts of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. L., 1211), and February 27, 1905 (33 Stat. L., 805), Congress appropriated for the settlement of the claims for services and supplies furnished during the Piute (or Washoe) war in Nevada in 1860. The amounts were in most instances those allowed by the State board of examiners of Nevada for services at the rate of $5 per day. Two of the service-claim appropriations were on awards of the Court of Claims under the Tucker Act, in which $45 per month were allowed for service as privates. (Congressional cases of Daniel E. Kimball, No. 10151, and John Alphin, No. 10152.)

As the right of a State under these precedents is founded upon the Constitution and is properly exercisable in cases of necessity, the right is superior to congressional action by way of prior authorization or subsequent recognition. If a State has been confronted with the necessity of seeing its citizens murdered and outraged and its frontiers devastated and defenseless before a merciless foe, and to secure protection it is found necessary to pay certain sums of money to enlist volunteers, it is derelict in its duty if it fails to secure such protection at any necessary cost; and if it be subsequently established as a fact, as it has been in this case, that the amounts so paid were necessary for the State to pay, it is entitled as of right, not as a matter of bounty or generosity, to be reimbursed every dollar so expended.

By an act of the Legislature of the State of Oregon passed in January, 1907, it is directed that the proceeds of this claim, after the payment of expenses, shall become a part of the principal of the common-school fund of the State.

Now, Mr. President, I ask to have inserted, as a part of what I have to say, a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of the State of Oregon against the United States April 30, 1909. That letter sets out the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of the State of Oregon and fully supports, both in the findings of fact and in the conclusions of the law, all that we claim in reference to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 28, Sixty-first Congress, first session.]

MAINTAINING STATE MILITIA DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

Letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of the State of Oregon against the United States.

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 30, 1909.

HON. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by the resolution of the United States Senate, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

[Court of Claims of the United States. Congressional, No. 13852. The State of Oregon v. The United States.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for money alleged to have been expended by the State of Oregon in recruiting and paying bounty to State volunteers in the United States service, and for recruiting, equipping, and maintaining State Militia during the Civil War. The claim was presented to the War Department and disallowed because the department had no jurisdiction to consider claims of this nature. It was then presented to the Treasury Department in 1884 under the act of June 27, 1882 (22 Stat. L., 111). It was disallowed by the Third Auditor on March 10, 1888, on the ground that the act of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 276), made no provision to pay expenses of raising troops for State purposes and not called into service by the request or authority of the Secretary of War or the President.

On May 29, 1908, the United States Senate, by resolution, referred to the court, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act, a bill in the following words:

"A bill for the relief of the State of Oregon.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $358,235.61 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the State of Oregon, in full settlement of its claim for raising, supplying, and equipping its volunteer troops and militia during the years 1861 to 1865, inclusive."

The claimants appeared and filed their petition in this court July 11, 1908, in which they make substantially the following allegations:

That on the 14th day of October, 1861, the Chief Executive, acting through the agency of the Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, addressed to the governor of the State of Oregon a letter, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, marked "Claimant's Exhibit No. 3," wherein attention was called to the necessity for the authorities of said State to place the same in a state of defense; to the fact that in previous wars the several States had independently and by separate activity supported and aided the Federal Government in its responsibilities, and that "in view of this fact, and relying upon the increase and continuance of the same disposition on the part of the loyal States, the President has directed me to invite your consideration of the subject of the importance of perfecting the defenses of the State over which you preside, and ask you to submit the subject to the consideration of the legislature when it shall have assembled. Such proceedings by the State would require only a temporary use of its means. The expenditures ought to be made the subject of conference with the Federal Government. Being thus made with the concurrence of the Government for general defense, there is every reason to believe that Congress would sanction what the State should do, and would provide for its reimbursement."

That in the month of October, 1861, by authority of the War Department, a call was made for the raising of a regiment of Cavalry in the State of Oregon, to be mustered into the service of the United States for a term of three years. Six companies of said regiment were raised during the winter of 1861 and 1862, when, by order of the War Department, it was directed that recruiting should cease. On January 5, 1863, a requisition was made upon the governor of said State for the raising of additional companies to fill the regiment. On account of the conditions then existing in that country, as hereinafter more fully set forth, and the inadequacy of the pay of such troops under the Federal laws then existing, it was found impossible to secure recruits to fill more than one company. One company was, however, raised and mustered into the service of the United States, under the command of Capt. H. C. Small.

That, commencing with the act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. L., 504), Congress had provided certain extra pay to the officers and enlisted men of the United States Army serving or enrolled in Oregon and California in recognition of the difference in the conditions existing in that section of the country. By said act of September 28, 1850, it was provided that there should be allowed to each commissioned officer while serving in said States, in addition to their regular pay and allowances, a per diem of $2 each, and to each enlisted man a per diem, in addition to their regular pay and allowances, equal to the pay proper of each as established by existing laws, said extra pay to be retained until said enlisted men were honorably discharged. By the act of Congress of August 31, 1852, said appropriation was continued, but the amount of extra pay to be paid enlisted men was reduced to one-half; these appropriations were not continued during the Civil War, and there were no troops of the Regular Army within the State of Oregon after the summer of 1861.

By the act of Congress of June 17, 1850 (9 Stat. L., 438), the President was authorized to enroll privates by volunteer enlistment in regiments of the Regular Army serving at the several military posts on the western frontier, and it was directed that whenever such enlistments were made at these posts a bounty equal to the cost of transporting and subsisting a soldier from the principal recruiting depot in the harbor of New York to the place of such enlistment should be allowed each recruit so enlisted. The amount so paid these recruits exceeded $150 per man. This provision was repealed by the act of August 3, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 288), although at the time of such repeal the conditions which had theretofore existed still obtained.

In the act of Congress authorizing the President to accept volunteers from the governors of the several States (act of July 22, 1861, 12 Stat. L., 268), and in the act of July 27, 1861, directing the refund to the governors of such States for expenses properly incurred for recruiting, etc., there was no restriction imposed as to the character or amount of such proper expenditures to be incurred or reimbursed.

No troops were raised or recruited by the Federal authorities in the State of Oregon during the Civil War. The pay provided by Congress for volunteers, $13 per month, was paid to the Oregon volunteers in legal-tender notes, notwithstanding that in Oregon and in the other Pacific coast States and Territories gold was maintained as to the standard of value, and such notes had in that section of the United States a commercial value of less than half of their face value. The wages of ordinary laborers in the State of Oregon at that time ranged from $2 to $5 per day, and the cost of living and the prices of all commercial commodities was correspondingly high, so that it became and was impossible for the State authorities to furnish volunteers for service without offering certain premiums or inducements as a consideration for enlistment, and after consultation and conference with the Federal officers in charge of the military department of the Pacific, said State, acting through its governor and legislature and at the urgent solicitation of said Federal officials, agreed to pay and did pay certain considerations for enlistment, as set forth in the succeeding paragraphs of this petition.

On the 5th day of October, 1864, the governor of the State of Oregon addressed a communication to the general commanding the district of Oregon, Brig. Gen. Benjamin Alvord, stating that the question of passing a law giving bounty for recruits was under consideration, but the fact that when they consider that it will run the State in debt $150,000 to raise 1,000 men seems to make the legislature hesitate, and that "if a call is made for more men I hope it will be made before the adjournment, so that the question will be fairly presented." In reply thereto Gen. Alvord, on October 18, 1865, addressed a letter to the governor of Oregon, wherein he states:

"I feel that it is very important for the public service, as I have continually represented to you for a long time that the Legislature of Oregon should pass a law giving bounty to volunteers."

On October 20, 1864, the legislature having meanwhile done nothing in the execution of these suggestions, Maj. Gen. Irwin McDowell, commanding the Department of the Pacific at San Francisco, Cal., telegraphed to the governor of Oregon that orders had been received from the War Department that a regiment of Infantry be raised in the State of Oregon as soon as possible.

Upon the receipt by the governor of Oregon of this call, he acknowledged the receipt thereof as follows:

"Your telegram requesting a regiment of infantry has just been received.

"I will do all in my power to raise it, but fear I may not have as good success as desired. I recommend the legislature now in session to offer bounties; but now it is but one day to the time of adjournment, and I regret to say that I fear a bill introduced for that purpose will not pass."

On the same day said governor advised the general commanding the district of Oregon, Brig. Gen. Alvord, of the receipt of the call for the regiment of infantry, stating that although there has not been a general disposition in the legislature to offer bounties, the making of this call will, he thinks, occasion the passing of the bill. Upon the receipt by the general commanding the department, Maj. Gen. Irwin McDowell, of the letter of the governor of Oregon of October 20, 1864, above quoted, said general telegraphed to the governor of Oregon urging the passage of said bounty law, and in response to this telegram said governor, on October 28, 1864, addressed to Gen. McDowell the following communication:

STATE OF OREGON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Salem, October 28, 1864.

Maj. Gen. IRWIN MCDOWELL,
Commanding Department of the Pacific.

GENERAL: Your telegram was duly received. I sent to the legislative assembly the inclosed message, and a law has been passed giving a bounty of $150 to each volunteer. Your telegram just in time. Without it the bounty bill would not have passed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

ADDISON C. GIBBS.

Your petitioner further states that, under stress of the foregoing facts, the Legislature of Oregon, on October 24, 1864, passed two acts, granting in the first what was termed "extra pay," but which was, in reality, an amount equal to the difference between the value of coin and that of the currency paid to troops serving in the United States Army as volunteers from the State of Oregon, the gold standard being then maintained on the Pacific coast and currency being depreciated approximately 50 per cent, and the second, a bounty of $150 to each recruit thereafter voluntarily enlisting.

There being at the time no available funds for the payment of such extra pay and bounty, it was provided in said acts that, to carry out their provisions, bonds of the State should be issued, and by section 6 of the first-named act it was provided that bonds to the amount of $100,000 should be issued, redeemable on the 1st day of July, 1875, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the date of their issue, payable semiannually, coupons for such interest to be attached to each bond. By section 8 of the second-named act it was provided that similar bonds bearing the same rate of interest should be issued, redeemable on the 1st day of July, 1884.

By another act, passed October 24, 1864, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, marked "Claimant's Exhibit No. 9," an appropriation of $1,000 was made to pay the expenses of engraving and printing in connection with the two acts above named.

On account of the inducements offered by the acts granting extra pay and bounty, as above set forth, the officers of said State were enabled to promptly and efficiently comply with said third call for the raising of a regiment of infantry, made, as above stated, on the 20th day of October, 1864, and did raise said regiment, which was thereafter mustered into the military service of the United States, and it served for the common defense of the United States until it was mustered out of service by companies at different dates from October 31, 1865, to July 19, 1867; and also, on account of such inducements offered for service in the United States Volunteer Army, said First Regiment of Oregon Volunteer Cavalry, recruited under the calls of October, 1861, and January, 1863, was continued in such service after the expiration of the original terms of service of its veteran volunteers, and, with recruits, continued in the military service of the United States until mustered out by companies at different dates from May 26, 1866, to November 20, 1866.

Your petitioner further states that the difficulties of recruiting troops to serve upon the established rates of Army pay, after the repeal of the provisions of the acts of 1850 and 1851, was fully represented to and recognized by the military authorities of the United States commanding in that country, and was by the general commanding the department duly reported to the War Department; that on November 20, 1863, the general commanding advised the War Department that in the execution of the varied duties and responsibilities in that remote department it had frequently been necessary for him to act promptly and assume responsibilities which in time of peace he would have deferred for the action of the General in Chief and War Department; that he has done and will thereafter do what seems to be his duty, acknowledging his responsibility to the General in Chief, the Secretary of War, and the President, in the concluding paragraph of his letter to the Missouri delegation of October 5, and that he requests of the Secretary of War an approval of all done by him in the matter of raising and organizing volunteer organizations in that department, necessary in view of the fact that objections may be made by the accounting officers in cases where the regulations of the department have not been followed. Inclosed in this communication he forwarded a copy of his General Orders, No. 40, modifying the general orders relative to recruiting by transferring to the governors of the States and Territories the control exercised by commissaries of musters and superintendents of recruiting service.

Your petitioner further states that the pasage of these acts granting extra pay were reported to the Secretary of War by the military authorities of said Department of the Pacific, and that the troops so recruited were called for and accepted with the knowledge of the conditions under which said States were required and did secure their enrollment.

The value to the United States of said bounty law in the State of Oregon and the interest of the military authorities of the United States therein is further shown by the following letter of the general commanding the district of Oregon:

HEADQUARTERS, DISTRICT OF OREGON,
Vancouver, Wash., January 10, 1865.

His Excellency A. C. GIBBS,
Governor of Oregon, Portland, Oreg.

SIR: I learn from Col. Maury on his return from Portland that the idea is entertained by some persons that the act of the Oregon Legislature of 24th October, 1864, providing for payment of $150 bounty "to every soldier who shall hereafter enlist for three years or during the war in any regiment, battalion, or company now organized or hereafter to be organized or raised as part of the quota of volunteers of this state, etc.," was not intended by the members of the Oregon Legislature for any but the First Oregon Infantry.

I desire to say that this must be a mistake, as at the first of the session I saw that a bill had been introduced by Mr. Donnell, providing for bounties only to the Oregon Cavalry. I instantly wrote to Mr. Donnell begging him to modify the language of the bill so as to apply to any troops which might be called for, as no one then knew what kind of troops would be called for. The bill passed so as clearly to include either Cavalry or Infantry.

It is essential in the new effort to raise the Oregon cavalry that the same bounties shall be promised as have been promised the Oregon infantry. The law clearly and unmistakably provides for them.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. ALVORD,
Brigadier General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding District.

That under said act of October 24, 1864, granting extra pay to the Oregon volunteers in the service of the United States, there was expended by your petitioner the sum of $90,392.99, the bonds to raise funds for payment to the amount thereof being issued on January 2, 1865, and during the period while said bonds were outstanding and unpaid, and until the maturity thereof, said State was required to pay and did pay interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, amounting to the sum of $44,745.20, making the total expenditure of said State for extra pay under said act the sum of $135,138.19, as will more particularly appear by reference to the vouchers thereof filed in this case under the title of "Abstract K."

Under said act of October 24, 1864, providing for the payment of bounty to volunteers thereafter enlisting, said State paid to such volunteers the sum of $129,041.02, and, having no available funds to meet said expenditure, did on January 2, 1865, issue bonds bearing interest at 7 per cent per annum, as therein provided, and did actually pay thereon, as interest, the sum of $62,466.45, making a total expenditure of said State on this account of the sum of $191,507.47, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers thereof filed in this cause under the title of "Abstract H."

And your petitioner further incurred and paid certain expenses in connection with the office of the adjutant general and the service and expenses of recruiting officers amounting to the sum of $9,731.33, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers thereof filed in this case under the title of "Abstract —."

Your petitioner necessarily incurred and paid certain expenses of the adjutant general's office in connection with the recruiting of said troops for postal expenses, amounting to the sum of $121.72, vouchers for which have been filed in this case under the title of "Abstract F."

And your petitioner further paid certain expenses for services of said adjutant general's office for clerk hire and miscellaneous items, amounting to the sum of $805.66, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract E."

And your petitioner further paid certain expenses for services rendered by various parties for supplies, printing, services, etc., amounting to the sum of $2,276.63, as will more fully appear by reference to the vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract D."

And your petitioner further states that it paid certain expenses of transportation, amounting to $724.42, as will more fully appear by reference to vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract C."

And your petitioner further states that it paid certain expenses for miscellaneous supplies, such as arms, ammunition, and camp equipage, forage, stationery, etc., amounting to the sum of $3,998.46, as will more fully appear by reference to vouchers filed under the title of "Abstract B."

Your petitioner further states that it was during the years 1863 and 1864 called upon at various times for volunteers for temporary service for periods of a few months, and that troops were mustered into such temporary service, occasioning a part of the expenses hereinbefore set forth; that in order to be in readiness to meet such calls, acting with the full knowledge of the military officers appointed by the War Department and the commander of said military district and in the spirit of the letter of the Hon. William H. Seward to the governor of the State above referred to, it made certain provisions for a State militia, and in order to render such militia efficient it was necessary that the same be assembled at various times, and on this account the petitioner paid during the years 1863, 1864, and 1865 the sum of $9,907; that said militia was not as such mustered into service of the United States, but its organization and efficient condition was occasioned and maintained in order to comply with the request of the honorable Secretary of State, as above set forth, and was reasonable and necessary to that purpose.

Your petitioner further states that it has been guilty of no laches or delay in the preparation or presentation of this claim, but that it duly presented the same to the Treasury Department and to the War Department; that said claim was disallowed by the War Department because said department had no jurisdiction over claims of this nature, and it was disallowed by the Treasury Department for the reason that under the construction of the acts of Congress adopted by that department such expenses could not be allowed.

Your petitioner further states that by an act of Congress approved July 27, 1861, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to reimburse the States for the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in enrolling, paying, etc., troops raised for service during the Civil War, and that under the liberal construction of said act which the Supreme Court of the United States (160 U. S., 598) has decided should be applied, the foregoing disbursements of the State of Oregon should have been allowed and paid, in that they were necessary to accomplish the raising of troops for the common defense.

The case was brought to a hearing on loyalty and merits on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1908.

Messrs. Ralston & Siddons and W. E. Richardson, Esq., appeared for the claimant, and the Attorney General, by Clark McKercher, Esq., his assistant, appeared for the protection and defense of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence adduced and after considering the arguments and briefs of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. In the early part of the Civil War the Federal troops in the State of Oregon were withdrawn for service in the East, rendering it necessary for the State authorities to raise troops for the protection and defense of the State and its citizens and the residents of adjoining Territories. Under various calls made by the War Department the State raised seven companies of cavalry and one regiment of infantry during said war, as hereinafter set forth, numbering in all about 1,810 men, which were mustered into the United States service and were engaged during the war and until the close of the year 1866 in operations against hostile Indians.

II. In the winter of 1861–62 private citizens of Oregon, pursuant to calls made by the United States military authorities of the Pacific coast, raised six companies of Cavalry, thereafter known as the "First Oregon Cavalry," which were mustered into the United States service for the term of three years. On January 5, 1863, to meet the then-existing demand for troops, a further call was made on the governor of Oregon for the raising of six additional companies to complete the regiment of First Oregon Cavalry. Efforts were made by the State authorities, assisted by United States officers, to raise these troops, and up to August 10, 1863, they had been successful in raising but one company. The terms of enlistment of many of these men would expire in 1864, and on October 24 of that year the Legislature of the State of Oregon passed an act entitled "An act for the relief of the commissioned officers and enlisted men of the Oregon volunteers in the service of the United States," granting to every Oregon volunteer then in the service of the United States extra pay to the amount of $5 per month from date of enlistment to date of discharge. Said act provided for the issuance of bonds to the amount of $100,000, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum. In the redemption of these bonds the State expended for principal and interest the sum of $135,279.72, and for advertising for the redemption of the bonds before maturity the sum of $354.10, making a total of $135,633.82.

The amounts so expended under said soldiers' relief act were paid to volunteers whose terms of service had expired or were about to expire. The payment of same was a gratuity on the part of the State and was granted without any authority from the United States, and the State of Oregon has no claim, legal or equitable, against the United States on account of the expenses so incurred.

III. On October 20, 1864, Maj. Gen. McDowell, commanding the Department of the Pacific, telegraphed the governor of Oregon that orders had been received by him from the War Department that a regiment of Infantry be raised in the State of Oregon as soon as possible. Upon receipt of said telegram the governor wrote Gen. McDowell as follows:

"Your telegram requesting a regiment of Infantry has just been received. I will do all in my power to raise it, but fear I may not have as good success as desired. I recommend the legislature now in session to offer bounties, but now it is but one day to the time of adjournment, and I regret to say that I fear a bill introduced for that purpose will not pass."

The conditions then existing in that State on account of the high rate of wages, the cost of living, the inadequacy of the pay of United States troops, and the depreciation of legal-tender notes in which they were paid, as provided by law, made it impossible for the State authorities to secure volunteers for the military service without offering premiums or inducements as a consideration for enlistment.

Brig. Gen. Alvord, commanding the district of Oregon, in a communication to the governor of the State, dated October 18, 1864, which was transmitted to the legislature in a special message by the governor, stated that he felt it important for the public service, as he had continually represented to the governor, that the Legislature of Oregon should pass a law giving bounty to volunteers; that the inadequacy of the pay was especially evident on the Pacific coast, where the depreciation of legal-tender notes was discouraging to volunteering. It also appears that immediately after the bounty act of October 24, 1864, hereinafter referred to, was passed the governor of Oregon, Addison C. Gibbs, sent the following communication to Maj. Gen. Irwin McDowell:

STATE OF OREGON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Salem, October 28, 1864.

Maj. Gen. IRWIN MCDOWELL,
Commanding Department of the Pacific.

GENERAL: Your telegram was duly received. I sent to the legislative assembly the inclosed message, and a law has been passed giving a bounty of $150 to each volunteer. Your telegram just in time. Without it the bounty bill would not have passed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ADDISON C. GIBBS.

On October 20, 1864, the governor sent a special message to the legislature of the State, informing it of the call made by the War Department for a regiment of Infantry and quoting from Gen. Alvord's letter, above referred to, recommending the passage of a law granting bounty to volunteers.

Thereupon the legislature of the State, acting upon the suggestion of Gen. Alvord, passed an act, approved October 24, 1864, granting a bounty of $150 to every soldier who should thereafter enlist for three years or during the war in any regiment, company, or troop then or thereafter to be organized, and by said act appropriated and set aside a fund of $200,000, called the soldiers' bounty fund, for paying said bounties.

The State at the time was without available funds for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of said act, and to provide for the fund thereby created authorized the issuance of bonds, redeemable July 1, 1884, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the date of issue. Thereafter the State raised one regiment of infantry, known as the First Oregon Infantry, which was mustered into the service of the United States for three years, and recruited all the companies of the First Oregon Cavalry whose terms of enlistment had expired.

In the raising of said regiment of infantry the State issued to soldiers enlisting after the passage of said act 2,760 bonds of the State of the par value of $50 each, and in the redemption of said bonds it necessarily and properly expended the following amounts: For principal, the sum of $129,041.02; for interest thereon the sum of $63,808, and for advertising for the redemption of bonds before maturity the sum of $481. The State also expended in connection with the raising of said troops and the payment of bounty under said act, the sum of $153 for printing said bounty bonds, warrants, commissions, county certificates, and bond books, making a total expenditure under said bounty act on account of bounties paid to volunteers mustered into the United States service of $193,543.02, no part of which appears to have been repaid to it.

IV. The troops so organized and mustered into the United States service as aforesaid were never actually called into the service of the United States in the suppression of the War of the Rebellion, but were engaged exclusively in the State of Oregon and adjacent Territories in the suppression of Indian outbreaks.

V. At the time of the passage of the act of the Legislature of the State of Oregon of October 24, 1864, the act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 379), granting bounty to one, two, and three year volunteers was in force and the records of the Treasury Department in the office of the Auditor for the War Department show that the enlisted men of the First Oregon Infantry were paid bounties by the United States under that act.

Said records also show that the enlisted men of the First Battalion of Cavalry, Oregon Volunteers, were paid bounties by the United States under the act of Congress of July 22, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 268, sections 5 and 6), and orders of the War Department, series of 1863, legalized by joint resolution of January 13, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 400).

VI. The Legislature of Oregon passed an act approved October 16, 1862, providing for an enrolled militia out of which the organized militia of the State should be formed. Companies were raised, equipped, and drilled, and the State expended during the years 1863 to 1865 in raising, supplying, and equipping said militia the sum of six thousand three hundred and twenty-three dollars and forty-four cents ($6,323.44).

No part of said militia was ever in the military service of the United States, and the State of Oregon has no claim, legal or equitable, against the United States for expenses incurred by the State in raising, supplying, and equipping the same.

VII. This claim was first presented to the War Department and was disallowed because that department had no jurisdiction to consider such claims. It was then presented to the Treasury Department in 1884 under the act of June 27, 1882 (22 Stat. L., 111), and was disallowed on the ground that the act of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 276), made no provision to pay the expenses of raising troops for State purposes.

Thereafter the claim was presented to the Fiftieth and subsequent Congresses and was transmitted to the court by resolution of the United States Senate, as hereinbefore set forth.

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to call to the attention of the Senate, and ask to have inserted in my remarks, a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury—the present Secretary, Mr. MacVeagh—of date January 5, 1911, making exactly the same findings as were made by the Court of Claims, and practically stating in terms that the Government of the United States is indebted to the State of Oregon in the amount of the claim inserted in the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

[House Document No. 1265, Sixty-first Congress, third session.]

CLAIM OF THE STATE OF OREGON.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report on the claim of the State of Oregon for equipment of volunteer troops.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 5, 1911.

SIR: I beg to submit my report pursuant to the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (35 Stat., 777), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to reopen, adjust, and audit the claims of the State of Oregon for expenses incurred in raising, supplying, and equipping its volunteer troops during the period of the Civil War, and to ascertain and report to Congress for consideration what sums, if any, were expended by the said State and have not been reimbursed to it by the United States on account of the principal of bonds issued, interest paid thereon, the expenses of advertising and printing in connection therewith, in providing means for the payment of bounty to volunteers mustered into the service of the United States and who were engaged in the State of Oregon and adjacent Territories in the suppression of Indian outbreaks.

It is found upon examination that the State of Oregon actually expended $193,929.82 in accordance with said laws in the redemption of bounty lands, interest thereon, and expenses connected therewith, as follows:

Paid for redemption of 2,719 bonds of the par value of $50 each (part redeemed below par)	$128,991.02
Interest on said bonds	64,344.20
Printing bonds, warrants, bond books, and bounty certificates	113.00
Advertising in newspapers for redemption of bonds prior to maturity	481.60
Total	193,929.82

The bonds thus issued, it appears, were not sold and the proceeds thereof used to pay the expenses of raising troops, but instead the bonds were issued directly to volunteers from the State of Oregon after their muster into the United States service, except in a few instances when they were issued to the legal representatives of soldiers who died in the service. The troops thus mustered into the United States service were engaged in the State of Oregon and adjacent Territories in the suppression of Indian outbreaks.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, I want to apologize to the Senate for the time I have consumed, but it seems to me that the Government of the United States ought not to be permitted by the Senate or by the House of Representatives to repudiate a claim which has been established by every branch of the Government that has any jurisdiction to ascertain and determine the facts with reference to these claims. Here is the claim of the State of Oregon; it is not stale; it has been insisted upon by Senators and by Representatives ever since the claim was incurred; and, Mr. President, its justice has been established by the Secretary of the Treasury; it has been established by the Secretary of War; it has been established by the Court of Claims; and if there ever was a claim on the face of the earth that neither the Government nor any individual situated as is the Government would be justified in repudiating, this is the claim.

So far as I am concerned, if there is any parliamentary method by which I can defeat this bill, unless this claim of the State of Oregon is allowed, I propose to resort to it, and to ask for a call of the roll or for a quorum or to do anything else that may be proper, because it is just as good a claim against the Government of the United States as any claim that ever was asserted or that ever was allowed. I think the Senate of the United States ought to see to it that the motion of the Senator from Missouri is not concurred in, but that this claim ought to be insisted upon by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I trust most sincerely that the Senator from Oregon will not enter upon the course he has suggested. I hope the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate recede and concur with the House will prevail, and for this reason: This bill left the House carrying some $6,000,000, and both branches of Congress have agreed upon that amount of deficiency as being justly due to the claimants. Here come certain claims from several States and we may, for the purpose of the argument, admit their justice—some $600,000 worth of claims for these several States.

I assume that they are just claims and that they ought to be paid. What is the use, Mr. President, at this stage of the session, at this hour in the morning, of the Senate, after the House has voted to adhere—which in a parliamentary sense is equivalent to a vote of the House that they will decline to consider any further these claims that the Senate has added to this bill—after that has happened, what is the use of the Senate further insisting upon its amendments and carrying it to the point of defeating $6,000,000 worth of deficiency claims which both branches admit are due, and which, if that action should prevail, would result in putting honest men all over the United States, who have trusted the Government of the United States, who have sold it goods and merchandise, who have a deficiency due them, and who are now being carried on borrowed money in banks in the different cities of the United States—what is the use of putting those honest men into bankruptcy simply because somebody else could not secure the allowance of claims which they think are due them?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Does the Senator think that the claims which have been due those parties for a short time should be paid and that claims which have been standing for fifty or a hundred years should be left unpaid? Why should the claims of these States be left out any more than the other claims? They are just. It has been decided here that the claims as put in the deficiency bill are in order and that it is the proper place for them; and simply because the House of Representatives does not want to pay the bill, is that any reason why the Senate should agree and leave out claims which are just and which have been standing for years and years and payment for which has been demanded over and over again?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Maryland, and I wish the House had included the claims for Virginia and Maryland and Texas and Oregon. The Senate voted to put them on the bill. I do not deny that they are just claims; but I say to the Senator from Maryland, after the House has declined to pay these four just claims, but has agreed to pay all the other claims, what justice is there, because we can not get these four just claims paid, in throwing all the other just claims out and putting honest men into bankruptcy? The claims to which the Senator from Maryland alludes are claims of States. Those claims can come up again; they can be put on other bills on which the rules of the House will allow them to stay; but in the meantime all these honest men, who, both branches of Congress admit need the money, and that the Government owes it to them to the extent of $6,000,000, are to be kept out of their money, and many of them are to be ruined. The States will not be ruined if they do not get their money now.

But aside from all the questions which the Senators have raised, what is the use of talking about the thing now? The House of Representatives have adhered, and when the House have adhered and said they will not have anything more to do with these claims, it is simply for the Senate to decide whether or not they will kill the whole bill simply because these four States can not get what is justly and honestly due them. It is not the Senate's fault, and the Senate can not remedy it. If the Senate sends this bill back to conference, nothing is accomplished, for the House declines to confer further; and Senators who vote to adhere or to further insist simply vote that they will not pay $6,000,000 worth of claims that both bodies have agreed upon because $600,000 of claims that the Senate added will not be agreed to by the other House.

I submit the reasonable, and as I think the best, thing to do under the circumstances is for the Senate to recede and allow these men who otherwise would be bankrupted to get their money and then all unite in the future to get these other claims allowed if possible.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say that the same argument is made every time this claim comes before the Senate. They say, "You have it not in the right bill"; and if we take it before one committee they say, "It ought to go before some other committee"; and it seems to me that if the Senate, which has passed this bill three or four times in separate form, intends to see that the Government pays its just debts, we ought to insist upon it now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I put it to the Senator. Here are four States whose credit is good and who can survive until the next session. Does the Senator from Oregon think it is fair and right, because those four States can not between them get a total of $600,000, that $6,000,000 of claims of individuals, many of whom will be bankrupted if they can not get their money now, shall be denied payment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the question of bankruptcy is a matter of imagination on the part of the Senator. I feel that possibly some people will suffer, but the State of Oregon and these other States have waited for half a century, and they have been unable to get anything. It seems to me that if we ever expect to get the money we must insist upon the parliamentary situation as we find it and insist upon the adjustment of their rights.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not usually in the habit of talking from my imagination. What I said was upon the basis of a statement made to me by a reputable and trustworthy Member of the House. I do not know a single item in the bill; I do not know that it concerns any constituent of mine; I do not know anything about it except that the committees of both Houses have agreed that these amounts are due. I have been informed, within 15 minutes, by a gentleman who has the honor to represent a district in San Francisco, whom I happened to meet in the cloakroom, that he knew of parties there who were being carried now by the banks of San Francisco, merchants who had trusted this Government, having bills for butter and poultry and things of that kind, and they are being carried by the banks, and if they can not get this money they will be bankrupt in three months. I have no interest whatever in this matter.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. JONES. I want to suggest to the Senator that there is one item here, under subsistence for the Army, amounting to $629,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. As I have said, I know nothing about the items in the bill, but, where the two Committees on Appropriations in the House and the Senate report a bill and have agreed upon certain amounts in the bill—and the great bulk of them are just claims—it seems to me to be pretty hard that the people whom we all admit we owe should be kept out of their money and forced to pay interest on borrowed money, if they can tide over; and if they can not, be forced into bankruptcy, because of the fact that four great States in the Union who have $600,000 of claims—one-tenth of the whole bill—insist they shall be paid now or nobody else shall be. It seems to me, to put it mildly, it is not a just or generous attitude. Therefore, I hope the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate shall recede will prevail.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say just one word in criticism of the conferees on the part of the House. Their action is past finding out, and I think they have treated the Senate in some respects with great contempt. There was one little item on this bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. Some years ago an appropriation was made for a post-office building at Charlotte, N. C. Charlotte is a growing town, one of our largest cities. Plans have been made and the contract let to the lowest bidder, and the department has asked for the sum of $5,000 for the rent of a post office while the Federal building is being built. I suppose the conferees expect the post office to be moved out into the street while they are putting up the new building.

I should like to know from some member of the conference committee why the House conferees insisted upon that amendment going out. It was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. Congress authorized an appropriation for the building. The plans were prepared, the contract let, and there is no place for the post office to go except out in the street, and yet the House conferees stand here for hours and hours and hours, insisting that that item should go out of this bill. Now, why? What is the reason for it, unless they just want to be contemptuous and bullheaded? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to make a protest in behalf of my old companions at the other end of the Capitol. I do not think they ought to be denounced as bullheaded. They have an equal right to participate in legislation and to stand by whatever they think is right.

In this connection I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry, in order to determine whether we can not somehow come together. I think that these several claims on the part of Texas and Oregon and Virginia and Maryland, all of them, so far as I can learn, just, might go over until another year, and we might possibly take care of the pages and the clerks with their extra month's pay.

I should like to ask the Chair if it would be in order to move to recede from so much of the Senate position as involves these alleged debts to the States, and to adhere to the Senate's position with regard to the extra month's pay. Mr. President, would that be in order? It seems to me it would be, because it seems to me it would bring the two Houses nearer together than the motion which is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question that a motion to recede from certain of the amendments is in order, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if the Chair——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit the Chair for a moment, it is ordinarily in order, but the Chair is not quite clear whether that would take precedence over the motion which has been made to recede from all the amendments. The Chair will look that up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there has been a motion made to recede from all the amendments, I admit that that would have precedence over the motion which I proposed to make, because it would bring the two Houses still nearer to an agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion, as there is a motion pending——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I express the hope that that motion may be withdrawn, so that we may proceed to try to settle the differences between the two Houses on a line of compromise. I have no doubt of the fact that a motion to recede from three or four amendments and to adhere to another would have precedence over a motion to adhere.

I would like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he is not willing to modify his original motion. I am rather anxious to see these people in clerical positions get their extra month's pay. They have generally gotten it. They have worked very arduously; they have had a long term; and many of them will not have enough money to pay their way home unless we provide for them.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (No. 65) authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of August, 1912, at 3 o'clock a. m., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PROPOSED FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (No. 65) of the House of Representatives, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of August, 1912, at 3 o'clock a. m.

Mr WARREN subsequently said: I report for action the concurrent resolution which I send to the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming reports from the Committee on Appropriations a privileged matter.

The concurrent resolution was read.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator from Wyoming wish action on the concurrent resolution now?

Mr. WARREN. I desire to have action. If it is thought necessary to name a different hour, in courtesy to the House we ought to do so now. Perhaps it may be necessary to amend the concurrent resolution, and I suggest that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the resolution?

Mr. PENROSE. Let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well; it will lie on the table.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like again to ask the Senator from Wyoming if I am correct in my understanding of the situation that the differences remaining between the conferees of the Senate and of the House now relate to five items in the deficiency bill, namely, those concerning the claims of the States of Virginia, Maryland, Texas, and Oregon, and the one month's additional compensation to the clerks and employees of the Senate and the House?

Mr. WARREN. There are but four numbers, but two of the States are contained in one number. The Senator is correct that there are five items in that respect, and those only.

Mr. STONE. Upon every other point the conferees have come to an agreement?

Mr. WARREN. They have.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate recede from these points of disagreement. It is not a pleasant thing to make that motion, for I know that the Senators from these States are greatly interested in the claims. I do not know very much about the claims of these States. They represent in the aggregate claims amounting to some $600,000, as I understand, against the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, Virginia, Maryland, Texas, and Oregon are not the only four States and the people living in these great Commonwealths are not the only people who have claims against the United States, just claims no doubt, that are standing out awaiting the action of Congress.

My friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] says something about a grievance he has with reference to a post office. I always sympathize with any grievance the Senator from North Carolina has, but that point has been settled between the conferees and is no longer in controversy.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say, in justice to the conferees on the part of the Senate, that they held out on this amendment until they found they could not get an agreement with the other side. They came to see me about it, and I said, rather than to have a disagreement all night and possibly prevent this legislation from becoming effective, I would willingly yield. It was the last thing they agreed to give up, hoping to get an agreement. But the conferees did not come to an agreement. The Senate conferees stood out to the very last on this amendment, because it was right and just.

Mr. STONE. I do not deny that it is right and just; I do not enter into that phase of the subject, but the House of Representatives is a coordinate branch of the law-making power, and the House of Representatives has as much right to speak upon these questions as the Senate—no more, no less. I wish all other Senators would follow the course of the Senator from North Carolina.

The Senate proposed a large number of amendments to the deficiency bill. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming how many amendments were made by the Senate to this bill?

Mr. WARREN. Something like a hundred and fifty or more.

Mr. STONE. One hundred and fifty or more. Mr. President, legislation of this kind, when it comes to the end, is always the result of compromise and agreement. Differences of opinion as to the wisdom or the right of items in appropriation bills always arise between the two Houses, and they are almost invariably settled by concessions.

I am not contending for a moment that the claims of these four States ought not to be paid, but, Mr. President, the State of Missouri has a claim, too, for as much money and no doubt as justly founded against the Government of the United States as the claim preferred by any of the States named. It is not quite as old as the claims of some of these other States, although it bears the wrinkled front of age. It is a little sere and yellow, but it is an honest claim. I would love to have that claim in this deficiency bill or in some bill. It ought to be considered, adjusted, and paid. It is a claim of the people of my State. There is really no good reason for giving any one of these claims a preference over others. But, Mr. President, we are now close upon adjournment, and we all want to get away. It was thought we would be able to adjourn to-night, and a resolution came to the Senate from the House proposing an adjournment at this hour.

Mr. President, we must concede something to the judgment of the House of Representatives. Out of one hundred and fifty-odd amendments made to this bill by the Senate the House has agreed to all of them except these five.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. STONE. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have what I think is good reason to believe that if we recede from these four amendments which involve the debts to these four States and adhere to our amendment in favor of the extra month's pay to the employees we would secure an agreement with the House. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he would not be willing to modify his original motion to recede on everything, which undoubtedly has precedence over my suggestion, so that only one question might come before the Senate. If that one question can come before the Senate, I am satisfied it would pass, and I am equally satisfied that the House would agree to the other amendment.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am in favor of allowing the extra month; and, accepting the statement of the Senator from Mississippi that he has reason to believe an agreement may be arrived at as to that point, I am perfectly willing to modify my motion. I have no information on the subject except the Senator's statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not wish to mislead the Senator from Missouri. I do not mean to say that I have any information that is absolutely conclusive. I am only expressing my own opinion from what I have heard.

Mr. STONE. I will accept that. Then, Mr. President, I will modify my motion and move that the Senate recede from its disagreement as to the items known as the Virginia, Texas, Maryland, and Oregon claims. I do not know that I have stated the motion as it should be stated, but what I mean is understood by the Senate. I also move that the Senate insist upon the remaining amendment, that an extra month's allowance be made to the employees of the Senate and House. Mr. President, I think that ought to be done in the interest of harmony.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply want to suggest that I have no inside information, but I have had occasion to observe a little what is going on and I have been discussing matters somewhat with others, and from all I have been able to gather and understand about the situation the item the Senator proposes the Senate shall insist upon is the most objectionable of all the items which are in disagreement. You will come nearer getting them to agree on anything else than on the very item which you propose to insist upon.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am confused now by advice. [Laughter.] I want to see this Congress adjourn. To tell you the God's truth, I believe the public interest will be advanced by an adjournment. Here are claims that may be entirely just and right and all that, but if the House say they will not agree to these items, what is the use of the Senate standing here insisting on these four or five items for hours—weary, disconsolate, and unnecessary hours—when nothing will come of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Of course the Senator from Oregon thinks, and no doubt correctly thinks, that his State has a good claim. Concede it, but the House of Representatives does not think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know the Senator from Missouri desires that Congress shall adjourn, but I want to say that unless I can get the Oregon claim inserted in this appropriation bill I will undertake to defeat the whole bill. That is the way I feel about it, because we have attempted time and time again to have this claim allowed, with the same results every time—some opposition has come which has succeeded in defeating the claim of our State.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that is not a statement which the Senator ought to make, with all due deference, or even adhere to. Here is a great appropriation bill, containing numerous items of vital importance to the public, and the Senator says that unless he can get a claim that his State has against the Government he will use all his great power and influence to defeat the passage of the bill, and thereby in the controversy delay indefinitely the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I probably ought not to say it, and ordinarily I would not say it, but we have been kissed off by such arguments as the Senator is now making for the past 25 years.

Mr. STONE. So have we in Missouri been kissed off.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will vote for any claim which Missouri has which is as honest as the claim of the State of Oregon.

Mr. STONE. I have not any doubt about the honesty of the claim, or rather I should say I have no reason to doubt the honesty of the claim. I change the form of the expression because I know little about the facts in the case, but I am willing to take what the Senator from Oregon says and "go it blind."

But, Mr. President, I believe we ought to adjust these matters of difference between the two Houses. I do not know how in the name of Heaven we are going to adjust them except by concessions on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate. Heaven knows that I would like to give old Virginia her $125,000. I believe that is the amount. It has been due, my good friend says, for 125 years; or is it 250 years, as my friend here suggests on the side?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I must express my surprise at the ignorance of the Senator on the question that he is discussing when he tells about the claim being 250 years old.

Mr. STONE. I did not say that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator has misrepresented the situation. The Senator expresses his interest in this claim and he has spent about an hour in making an argument against it. I hope there are not many others interested in the same way.

Mr. STONE. I did not say 250 years. I said 125 years. How nearly is that right?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is approximately right, according to the Senator's view of the case.

Mr. STONE. Well, then, I am approximately right. About as close as men need to get is to be approximately correct on a question of that kind. The claim is 125 years old. I have no objection to the age. If it was 250 years old, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] has suggested to me, it ought to be paid, if it is just. [Laughter in the galleries.] I am not speaking against the righteousness of the claim, but I am urging that these differences be compromised for the present, so we may adjourn and go home.

It may be, as my friend from Indiana says, that the older a claim is the better it is; that, like wine, the older the vintage is the better it is. I do not mean by this to assail the integrity or the righteousness of this claim. I am for almost anything Virginia wants, or Oregon or Maryland or Texas may want. All they have to do, as far as I am concerned, or about all they have to do, is to hold out their hands, and if I have anything to drop into their palms I am more than ready and willing to drop it in. I love these States, and I love the people in them and the Senators and the Representatives whom those constituencies have sent to Congress. It ought not to be necessary to say that. It goes without saying.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, we must come to an agreement. I forego the claim of my State. I pass it by for the present. So will other Senators and other Representatives whose States have just claims pass them by. These claims, I have no doubt, are just, but we must not forget that the House of Representatives is at least one-half of the Congress, and that body has just as much right to an opinion upon a question of this kind or upon any other question of legislation as the Senate has.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred we have yielded to the claim of the House of Representatives. I feel, as the Senator from Missouri does, that they are entitled to an equal share in questions of legislation, but we have more than done our part in yielding to them in everything that they have asked from us.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, my friend's statement, I think, is not quite fortunate. I have just asked the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Senate conferees how many amendments have been made by the Senate to this deficiency bill. He told me over 150. Now, just how many of those amendments our conferees and the House conferees have agreed upon I do not know, but if out of over 150 amendments there are only 5 left to make the basis of an agreement, it does seem to me in this exigency we might close the account. Nothing grieves me more than to say this when four Senators for whom I have the greatest respect and affection, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], stand here in order to get claims averaging about $150,000 for their respective States and insist upon adhering. This means a long contest with the House of Representatives, the great popular branch of the Congress, and I feel that at this stage of the session we ought to recede and adjourn.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will not forget that this is not the first time we have attempted to get these claims through, but in the case of Oregon this is the fourth time that the Senate of the United States has passed the claim favorably, and every time it has been defeated.

Mr. STONE. I know; and three times—not quite four, but three times—a bill in which the people of my State are interested has passed the Senate, and yet it hangs fire.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say to the Senator that if his State has a claim anything near as fair, as honest as the claim of the State of Oregon, or of these other States that have presented claims, there is not a Senator on this side who would not stand by him and do all in his power to assist him in its passage.

Mr. STONE. I have not any doubt of it; but, Mr. President, I wish to say to my good friend from Oregon that I, too, am reluctant to yield, but at a moment like this, when the whole business, practically, of this session is concluded and we are all waiting, tired and anxious, to adjourn, even though my friend from Oregon and my distinguished friends from these other States should say to me, "Stand firm; do not yield; make it a point and an issue between the Senate and the House, and stay here indefinitely until the claim of Missouri is allowed," I would say, "My beloved friend, I thank you for your courtesy and interest; but I will not keep the other ninety-odd Senators and the House of Representatives sitting here hours and days, and it may be weeks, over a contest of that kind. I will yield the point and hope for a satisfactory arrangement and adjustment of the claim later on."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know that the Senator from Missouri will give me credit for occupying as little of the time of the Senate as any man in it. I never get up to insist upon a claim or to insist upon a proposition unless I think it is right; and when I do feel and when I do think that a claim which is urged by me is just and is honest I am willing to stay here just as long as any man in the United States to insist that that claim shall be recognized and adjusted and paid by the Government of the United States; and I feel that way to-night.

Mr. STONE. Let me ask my friend from Oregon this question: It happens to be that there are claims from four States, and that makes a pretty strong combination. Suppose there was pending here only the one claim from the State of Oregon, all the others having been agreed to or never having been presented, does my friend from Oregon mean to tell the Senate that, if he could do it, he would hold this Congress in session indefinitely in order to compel the Congress to pass a bill paying his claim?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri asks me a question, and I will say to him that if I had it in my power to hold the Senate here indefinitely on a claim which was just I would do it every time; and, so far as I am concerned, I would stay here until next December and see to it that a just claim against the Government of the United States in favor of the State of Oregon or of the State of Virginia or of Texas or of Maryland would be paid before we got away from here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to suggest to the Senator from Oregon, who is my warm personal friend, the idea that it is at least to be considered that the nearly 400 Representatives of the people at the other end of the Capitol are equal legislative factors with him; and if he thinks he has a right to hold up nearly 400 immediate Representatives of the people in order to assert what his idea of justice is of a claim against their idea of its justice, or their idea of its nonallowance, at any rate—I do not know what—it seems to me that he is misplacing the two branches of the National Legislature and very much overemphasizing a Senator, either himself or me or anybody else, as a legislative factor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not mean to say that I have the right, but if the occasion ever happens when I have the power I propose to assert it; and I think to-night I have the power, and I propose, so far as in me lies, to exercise that power, because of the parliamentary situation. If I am mistaken in that, then I fail in my effort.

Mr. STONE. Very well, Mr. President, if the Senator has the power to hold up the Congress, and in that way to force the allowance of a claim, then I imagine we may be here until Christmas.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will stay.

Mr. STONE. Very well, Mr. President, then I have nothing more to say.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate very long in presenting the claim of Virginia for the consideration of the Senate. The claim of Virginia is for a definite amount; it is exact; it is ascertained. There is no dispute as to the amount. It is for $120,000, transferred from the treasury of Virginia to the Treasury of the United States. There is no doubt about the amount; it is not a question of ascertainment; it is specific by the act of the General Assembly of Virginia. The books of the United States show that it was received. The only question that arises is whether or not it is due by the United States. It has never been paid. The only question that the United States ever presented, even by the conferees of the House, was whether Virginia gave this amount to the United States Government or loaned it. That is the only issue. The United States has never paid it.

Let us look at the act of the General Assembly of Virginia which fixed this amount. A bill was first introduced, which granted it as a gift to the United States Government. That bill came before the General Assembly of Virginia. Chief Justice Marshall, who presided for more than 30 years over the Supreme Court, was at that time a member of the General Assembly of Virginia. He opposed Virginia making this gift to the Federal Government; he opposed it as a grant, and he offered an amendment that Virginia advance the money—in other words, to make a loan to the Government of the United States of this amount of money. The Federal Government was poor; Virginia was rich, and Virginia made this loan, and made it by an act of the general assembly. The United States Government accepted the loan of this amount of money from the State of Virginia when its Treasury was empty. Virginia was rich, strong, and powerful. The United States Government used this money, and it helped to build this Capitol. Virginia has tried ever since that time to get the Federal Government to pay that loan. Bills for the purpose of its payment have passed the Senate repeatedly. Every committee that has investigated the claim has decided in favor of it. No man who has the least idea of honesty or justice or pride in his Government should hesitate about paying this loan.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would ask the Senator from Virginia if the same arguments to which he refers that have been made here to-night have not been made every time by the opponents of this claim?

Mr. SWANSON. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will yield to me for just a moment, I will state my purpose in asking him to yield, so that he need not yield unless he desires to do so. I am going to ask him to yield to allow me to make a motion to adjourn until Monday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. I will not yield until I finish.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to give my reasons for asking the Senator to yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I will not yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just let me give one reason now why we ought to adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. I will only occupy about five minutes, and then I will yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield now?

Mr. SWANSON. I will not yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Here is an amount of money that is clear, exact, and specific. The Government of the United States admits it never paid a cent of it. The terms of the act of the General Assembly of Virginia were that it granted it, it loaned it. They were made by Chief Justice Marshall, whose justice and fairness and ability and sense of equity can not be disputed. The Federal Government took the money out of the State treasury of Virginia and put it in the Federal Treasury, and used it to construct this Capitol. The State of Virginia, as I have previously stated, has been asking payment repeatedly for the money which it loaned, and yet the Federal Government refuses to pay the money borrowed from the State of Virginia in the day of its wealth, in the day of its power, when the Federal Government had no credit, no money, and a bankrupt Treasury. In those days Virginia gave her credit and the resources of her treasury to help to sustain the National Government, as she has done repeatedly since the formation of this Government.

This claim of Virginia, as I have said, has been reported favorably by every committee that has ever investigated it; it has passed the Senate repeatedly during the last 20 years, and has gone over to the House of Representatives. In the House of Representatives there are a few men who think they have a right to put their approval or disapproval on every item of appropriation passed by the Senate or by Congress. The bill providing for the payment of this claim has been favorably reported there. There is no dispute about the justice of it; there is no dispute that the amount has never been repaid to Virginia. This bill came over here but a few days ago carrying five or six million dollars of claims against the Government, and in their arrogance of superiority, in their arrogance of judgment, the House conferees say this claim shall not be paid; this claim shall be thrown out. So it has been thrown out for 20 years. For 20 years we have heard the same old siren song, "Wait until the next session; wait until the time comes again; wait until you can get the item on a different bill and we will pay it." I say the time has come for these States to assert their right and for the Senate to insist on its right as a coordinate part of this Government in making appropriations. For my part I am willing to stand here and make a fair and determined fight for the payment of this claim.

Why should a man object to paying money that this Government borrowed, money which was loaned to it by a State in the day of the Nation's poverty, in the day of its want, in the day when it did not have a dollar in its Treasury? Has the time come when a man does not feel a pride in the Federal Government discharging its obligations? Has the time come that the Senator from Missouri had rather return home and receive the acclaim of his people and hear their words of praise and commendation than to stay here for some days and discharge an honest debt, a debt that was incurred at the time the money was needed? Is that the high order of public men that Missouri presents to us? No, sir. Remain here and let the Federal Government be honest; let it pay an honest claimant; remain here several days longer, and let the Senate assert its right as a coordinate branch of this Government, equal to the House of Representatives, to make appropriations and place amendments on appropriation bills.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. STONE. As I have already said, I do not at all question or impeach the justice of this claim which my friend is so eloquently advocating, but there are other claims equally as just, if not quite so old, and many of them nearly as old. Mr. President, I should like to ask my friend whether he does not think, when we get right down to "brass tacks," that a matter of this kind, in the nature of a claim—in fact, a plain claim of a State or an individual—I can not see that the State has any preference over an individual——

Mr. SWANSON. I have yet to hear the question to be presented to me by the Senator; I am still waiting for the question that he arose to propound.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will wait, I will get the question stated. The Senator is impatient.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not impatient, but the Senator is very prolonged in his interrogation.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask the Senator whether he does not think that claims of this kind in fact ought to pass on their merits and not be put on appropriation bills?

Mr. SWANSON. There are about four or five thousand claims put on this bill, claims not as just, not so long delayed, and not so clear as this. The United States Government has admitted this claim; it has stated it was a loan; it accepted the check; it took the money out of the treasury of Virginia and has never paid it back. It is a disgrace that payment has been delayed so long.

But, Mr. President, Virginia has done more than let the Government have this money. It should go back into the treasury of Virginia; it should be paid in cash with interest; but being unable to obtain a repayment of this loan, what have we done?

There is near Washington the most sacred spot in America, where lie entombed the remains of George Washington, the foremost man of this country, the man who made more sacrifices and more efforts to build up this country than all other men combined. This Government has spent millions of dollars for highways leading to its cemeteries and to its public buildings; and yet in all the years we have been here, with all the eulogies which have been delivered both in the House and the Senate on George Washington, this Government has been too parsimonious and too narrow to construct even a highway to Mount Vernon, where lie the remains of Washington.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I can not yield just now. The National Government has not given a single cent for that purpose. It has been generous to the memory of other public men not so eminent as Washington. Virginia, being unable to get this money herself, provided by an act of her general assembly that the $120,000, when collected, should be dedicated to build a highway from Washington to Mount Vernon—something the Government ought to have done years ago. Not a cent of this money will go into the treasury of Virginia; it is all dedicated to what the Federal Government should have done years ago—to erect a monument suitable to Washington in the shape of a highway from the capital of the country to Mount Vernon, where repose the remains of the immortal Washington. Is repayment of the money generously loaned by Virginia for a national purpose to be denied because of the attitude of Members of the House of Representatives? Are we to surrender?

I have been in Congress for nearly 20 years and during that time have observed that certain men in the other body always favor claims made for their States or districts, but just and honest claims like this, owed by the Federal Government, are always subject to their disapproval. As for me, I am willing to stay here, if it takes two weeks or three weeks or a month, to see that this honest claim is paid and that this highway to Mount Vernon is constructed. I am glad my State was generous and patriotic enough to dedicate the amount when repaid—if it is repaid—to aid in doing what the Federal Government should have done years ago—to connect the capital of the country, selected by Washington, with his home and his tomb. I shall insist upon this amendment going on this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, suppose the motion of the Senator from Missouri should carry and the bill should then pass, it would require about five hours to enroll before the bill could be ready for the President. In view of that fact, and in view of the further fact that, in all probability, there is enough determination upon the other side of the Chamber to assure that this motion shall not prevail and to force a roll call, and inasmuch as that roll call would show the want of a quorum and would keep us from doing anything except calling the roll from now until Monday, I think it very proper at this time that the Senate should adjourn, and I therefore move that the Senate now adjourn until Monday at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Will the Senator give me a very few moments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from North Dakota debated the motion before he made it. He stated at some length his reasons for it. Under those circumstances, is it not allowable to answer the argument?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is not a debatable question. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate stand adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m. on Monday next. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pardon me. I withdraw it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator can not withdraw it.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; he can not withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon that he be permitted to withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I rise to inquire if the Senator can withdraw it whether or not there is objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that this body can do pretty much anything by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the suggestion is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the motion submitted by the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A division, Mr. President.

There were, on a division—ayes 11, noes 16.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that the Senate recede from its amendments Nos. 22, 33, and 34, and further insist upon its remaining amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I am sorry, indeed, to have to protest against the Senate adjourning. I have but a very few minutes in which I shall make a few remarks. In fact, I hardly think it is necessary for me to say anything in regard to this motion of the Senator from Missouri or in regard to the claim of the State of Maryland, as it has been so forcibly put by the Senators from Virginia.

The claim of the State of Maryland stands upon the same footing as the claim of Virginia. As I have said, I do not think it necessary for me to add anything to what has been said by the Senators from Virginia. Yet I can not refrain from entering my protest, as a Member of this body, against this Government repudiating its just debts, and not only repudiating them once, but over and over again, refusing to pay honest claims against it.

Mr. President, so far as concerns the State of Maryland, the money was advanced to the Government of the United States for the purpose of building this Capitol here, not, as the Senator from Virginia says, from a rich State, but it was advanced by the State of Maryland, and in order to secure the money we sold our coal lands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Without interrupting the line of the Senator's argument, I should like to say that I have been very much interested, from the historical point of view, in these claims. I should like to have the Senator state the circumstances under which the claims were incurred—how it was the State of Maryland was called on to contribute, as I understand, to the building of the Capitol.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I should say to the Senator from Washington that the State of Virginia, by a resolution, offered to appropriate a certain amount of money if Maryland would appropriate a certain amount. By an act of the Legislature of Virginia and by an act of the Legislature of Maryland they agreed to advance, the State of Virginia $120,000 and the State of Maryland $72,000, to assist in building a Capitol in Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Can the Senator state what action, if any, was taken by the Federal Government at the time with reference to that donation? How was it accepted by the Federal Government? What was the initiation of it?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am not just able to say how it was paid. There is no question as to its having been accepted by the Federal Government and acknowledged as such. There is no doubt that Washington, then President, instructed the accounts to be kept so as to show the amounts due the States of Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The question I ask is in a perfectly friendly spirit.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am accepting it in that spirit and answering it so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am favorably disposed toward the claim.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I appreciate that, and am very willing to answer any question I can answer, and shall do it with pleasure.

As I was going on to say, this money is due to the State of Maryland. I, for my part, can not understand how anybody can ask us to wait longer for it. In the State of Maryland, as far back as 1842, we asked for the payment of this claim, and the State of Maryland has continued to ask for it at different times—many times—but on every occasion it has been "wait," "postpone it," "wait until the next session." Now, I want to ask, in all seriousness, why should we wait longer? Why should not this money be paid? Is there any reason? These claims have been authenticated and approved by committee after committee.

As the Senator from Missouri, who made the motion to recede, remarked to-night, it is a just claim. I hear nobody dispute the justness of the claim. And why should we wait longer when we have been waiting over 100 years and have been asking for it repeatedly for 60 or 70 years?

I hope the motion of the Senator from Missouri will not prevail. This money is due us. We have asked for it. It is honest. The Government of the United States is able to pay it, and it ought to be paid, and they ought not to ask us to wait longer for what is due and what is just and what is honest and what the Government should have paid long since. It is a disgrace that it has not been paid earlier.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate adjourn until 2 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. LEA. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for a matter of personal privilege?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CLAPP. I trust the Senator from North Dakota will withdraw his motion in consideration of the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee that he wishes to rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I came to Washington to-day. On account of personal reasons it has been impossible for me to attend certain sessions of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections investigating campaign expenses in the elections of 1904 and 1908. I had determined to ask to be relieved from further service on the subcommittee on account of my inability to attend the sessions at this time. But this morning a resolution was adopted putting it over until September 30. Later a request was received from Col. Roosevelt, asking that he be allowed to appear before the committee on Monday to answer certain testimony of Mr. Archbold.

On account of illness in my family, and being uncertain whether I can attend any of those sessions of the subcommittee, I ask to be relieved from further service on the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee ask to be relieved from service on the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. LEA. From service on the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would seem to be a matter for the committee rather than for the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hardly think the Senator from Tennessee wants to be relieved from service on the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He refers to the subcommittee. That is a matter to be settled between himself and the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LEA. I took up the matter with the chairman of the subcommittee, and he has no jurisdiction.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not apprehend that the chairman of the subcommittee could accept resignations or fill vacancies. If he has that power, then that is sufficient.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The chairman of the subcommittee has not.

Mr. PENROSE. It is very clear that the chairman of the subcommittee has not the power to fill vacancies. That resides in the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what the Chair would hold.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Tennessee should address himself to and hand his resignation to the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who will appoint a successor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is what I endeavored to suggest—that it went to the chairman of the committee. Of course the chairman of the subcommittee can not do it. Neither can the Senate dispose of it.

Mr. LEA. I am sorry to have taken the time of the Senate, but this course was suggested to me.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to incorporate in my remarks of the day before yesterday certain excerpts from the opinion of the judges in the case of "The People ex rel. Perkins versus Moss, 187 New York." I referred to the case, but I find that I did not incorporate all that I desired in my remarks. I now ask unanimous consent to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that the Senate adjourn until 2 o'clock Monday next. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. SMOOT. A division, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some of us have just come into the Chamber, and we do not know what is the motion before the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate adjourn until 2 o'clock on Monday next, on which a division has been demanded.

The motion was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 11, noes 16.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to recede——

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood that the Senator from Missouri modified his motion and moved to recede from the four propositions and insist upon the remaining one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds it difficult to complete a statement because of Senators intervening. The Senator from Missouri moves to recede from amendments of the Senate numbered 22, 33, and 34 and further insist on its amendment numbered 114.

Mr. REED. As a matter of inquiry, the amendment we are insisting upon relates to what subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To the extra pay to the clerks and employees of the Senate and the House.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, believing as I do from the statements that have been made during the discussion by the Senators from Maryland, Virginia, Texas, and Oregon as to the claims by those States against the Government being just, I am very earnestly in favor of their payment. I am willing to do anything that I can consistent with reason and with my duty to other people to bring about the results those Senators so earnestly desire.

But some things I can not quite understand. If we agree to the report of the conferees this money is lost to those States at this time in so far as that particular bill is concerned, but I do not understand how it is that if we refuse to concur in the report they will get that money at this time and through this bill. I judge from the statement made by some Senators that they are of opinion if the Senate will not yield to the House in this matter the House will then yield to the Senate, and that in that way the money will be paid.

I very much regret that a Senator during the discussion of the matter this evening felt himself impelled to speak of the House of Representatives as being "contentious and bull-headed"; but if that criticism of the House of Representatives by that Senator is correct, I do not see that our holding out is going to make them come in. The question I wish to ask Senators from the States who are pleading for the rights of their States is, How long would they expect the Senate to refuse to concur in order to try and get the appropriation that they desire? So far as I am concerned, my personal inconvenience will not count at all in the matter, but I happen to know that the pay of hundreds, and I say perhaps thousands, of people all over this country is being held up by the fact that this bill does not pass, and I have to consult their rights. I know that in my own State employees and individuals connected with the Federal courts have received no money at all since last May, and I happen to know that they are borrowing money from the banks and paying interest on it in order to live, because many of them are poor and not able to get along without their salaries. Under those circumstances I would not feel justified in continuing here indefinitely, as the Senator from Oregon says he would, but I am willing to stay a reasonable time. Can we now get any assurance from them as to how long they would like to have us remain and hold out against the House, in the hope by so doing that the House will yield to us?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana one question. Suppose his State had presented a claim against the Government of the United States which was absolutely just, which had been certified by the Treasurer of the United States, which had been certified by the Secretary of War, which had been certified by the Court of Claims after Congress had persistently and constantly turned it down, if he had the power to resist an adjournment would he ever consent to an adjournment under those circumstances?

Here is a claim of the State of Oregon which was incurred between 1861 and 1867. It has been presented to Congress repeatedly since 1867. It has been passed upon favorably in the Senate session after session, referred to conference committees one session after another to which it had been certified as correct, and it has been repeatedly turned down by some young man in the House of Representatives who did not know anything about the circumstances. Suppose the Senator had a claim in exactly the same circumstances, would he ever have surrendered his rights if he had an opportunity to insist upon its payment? Would he have surrendered his rights under any circumstances or conditions?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I should like to supplement what the Senator from Oregon said in regard to the claims of Virginia and Maryland. These debts have been due since 1791. The payment has been asked repeatedly since 1842, and at times passed by one House and at times passed by the other House, and it was always insisted that it should wait until the next session. What would the Senator do? When are we to get it? It seems to me that some time must come when we must insist, and probably use what might be termed harsh means.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, replying to the question addressed to me by the Senator from Oregon, I hope he understood me to say at the beginning of my remarks that I believe in the justice of the claim of his State against the Government and it is one which should be paid, and that I am willing to do anything in reason and am willing to submit to any personal inconvenience myself in order to have the debt paid to that State.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. THORNTON. I will ask the Senator to allow me to finish answering his question and then he can ask another if he wishes. I have not answered his question. It was necessary for me to preface it in the way I did.

I say I would be willing to stay here personally all the balance of the summer in order to obtain the payment of these just debts, but I would not be willing, if the State of Louisiana had a just claim against the Government, to hold out for an indefinite period and delay the payment of salaries to a number of people which the Government owes and who are absolutely dependent for their support upon their salaries. I wish to say to the Senator from Oregon I make a very great distinction between a debt due to a State and a debt due to individuals in this way, the State is not dependent on its recovery and the individuals are dependent on its recovery.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to interrupt the Senator from Louisiana just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THORNTON. I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know the Senator from Louisiana personally, and I knew of him well by reputation before it was my pleasure and honor to become acquainted with him personally. I know that within his breast there beats the same honesty of purpose that beats in my own breast, and I know that no man could appeal to him for the payment of an honest and a just debt, when that appeal would not be granted cheerfully and at once.

Mr. President, I appeal to him as an honest man, I appeal to him as a man who came from a State adjoining my own, I appeal to him as a man who joined in a fight for the same cause that I did, not personally, but by representatives in the person of my brother and my father. I appeal to him to see to it that justice to my State is granted, just as exactly as he would grant justice to his State if he stood before this body appealing for justice as I do now.

I assure the Senator, as I have assured this body, Mr. President, that the claim which the State of Oregon has presented is a just claim. It is a claim which has been vouched for, not only by the Treasurer of the United States, but it is a claim which has been certified by the Secretary of War. It is a claim which has been vouched for by the Court of Claims in an adjudication, the purpose of which was the ascertainment of the right between the State and the Government of the United States. All of them have held that the claim of my State is a just claim and ought to be paid.

Here we are met by the appeal of the Senator from Missouri that this claim ought to be referred to one or the other committees of the Senate. Every time that this claim was referred they have said to us the claim was referred to the wrong committee, it ought to have been referred to some other committee.

I say to you, Mr. President, it has been now referred to this committee of conference. It has been passed by the Senate. It has been disagreed to in the conference, and I say if any spark of manhood is left in the Senate they will insist upon it that this body, a coordinate legislative body of the United States, has some rights that the House of Representatives shall observe.

Mr. President, I do not need to question the power or the rights or the functions of the House of Representatives, but I do insist that this body has some rights which the House of Representatives ought to respect.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I propose to stand here till doomsday to see to it that not only this claim but the claim of Texas, the claim of Maryland, and the claim of Virginia, and the claim of any State which is a just claim against the Government of the United States, shall be paid.

I propose, so far as the power and authority rest in me to do it, to see to it that no claim shall have any preference over the rights of Maryland or Texas or Virginia or Oregon in the matter of this discussion, and if we have any rights, parliamentary or otherwise, I propose to insist upon them.

I know the Senator from Louisiana, in the big heart he has and with the justice that animates him, will see to it that Oregon and Maryland and Virginia and Texas shall have what is justly their due, no matter whether it happens to defeat the claim of somebody else or that a claim may be asserted that is prior to the claims of these States.

Mr. STONE. I should like, with the consent of the Senator from Louisiana——

Mr. THORNTON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon this question. He says he would stand here until doomsday—that means the end of time—in order to secure the passage of a bill to grant this claim to Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I say that, Mr. President, and I mean it.

Mr. STONE. I am repeating what the Senator said. But if we stood here until doomsday and you still did not get the claim, what profit is it to the balance of us if we stay here until doomsday in a vain attempt to get a claim for Oregon? I want to go home.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I said that I would stay here until doomsday, and I will. While I recognize the ability of the Senator from Missouri, and while I realize and know that he can not live in the ordinary course of events as long as I can, he probably will die and be succeeded by a man who has a larger heart than he, by a man who has a heart as large as my good friend from Louisiana, who will consent in the final analysis to the payment of a just claim which the United States owes not only to a State but to individuals in this country.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to assure the Senator from Oregon that his kindly personal expressions about myself are very highly appreciated and are most cordially reciprocated.

Mr. STONE. And I highly appreciate the compliment.

Mr. THORNTON. But, Mr. President, I can not admit the inference that seems to come from some of his remarks that I would be guilty of an act of injustice if I did not hold out indefinitely for the payment of these claims in this bill. I have already said, as far as I am personally concerned, it would cut no figure; I would be willing to stay at the cost of any amount of personal inconvenience; but I must consult the condition of other people whom the Government has employed and who can not get their pay while this bill is being held up; and I think that I would be guilty of a much greater injustice to them, and a much greater hardship would be entailed on them than would be entailed on the four States by not getting the money.

I have always intended to vote against the motion of the Senator from Missouri at this time, with the hope that by defeating it we could bring about the result desired by the Senators from these four States, but I certainly am not willing to stay here indefinitely in order to do so, and I will not do it in justice to the poor people who need their money owing to them by the Government, and who, to my knowledge, for it has been brought to my attention during this very week, are borrowing money from the banks, paying interest on it, and pledging what is due to them by the Government in order to be able to get the necessities of life for themselves and their families.

I had not expected to speak over three minutes on the subject, and I would not have done it if it had not been for the interruptions that I have received.

I have said now all that I intend to say and I hope I have made my position plain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I know that my Mississippi friend from Oregon did not mean quite all he said about "doomsday." It may be that owing to the superiority of his age the Senator from Missouri may die before my friend from Oregon does, but I have an equal junior right to him and perhaps may outlive him.

Luckily there is just one thing that the Senate of the United States can do without unanimous consent, only one as far as I have learned, and that is to adjourn. The United States Senate can adjourn without unanimous consent, and if the Senator and those who work with him conclude that they must insist upon those items at this time, we can adjourn and leave the deficiency bill in the air until December.

The Senator says that always when these claims have come up they have been turned down by some young man in the other House. I used to be a Member of the House of Representatives and I made acquaintance with the insolence and arrogance of the Senate in conference. It got to be well understood by me that, while the House conferees could act by majority, the Senate conferees could not act at all, except by having a unanimous consent in the Senate. Any Senator who insisted upon any item, somehow or other by unanimous consent, held up the conferees and everybody else. I think that arrogation of superiority to the other coordinate branch of the National Legislature had better begin to stop, and it is about time now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not mean that my friend from Oregon has been guilty of that sort of arrogance. I mean to refer to my knowledge historically of the relationship between the two Houses.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi for just a moment. I said that proceedings for the allowance of these claims were interrupted by some young man in the other House. It has been a long time since the Senator from Mississippi was in the House, and he was a young man then, but I hope the Senator will not think for a moment that I am anywhere near as old as he is now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, we shall not enter that pleasant discussion. I really do not know which one of the two of us is older. I am merely resenting the idea that whoever controls the House of Representatives must be some "young man," mentioned in a contemptuous sort of way. From my experience in the House of Representatives and my experience in the Senate, I have known as many smart, wise men in the House as I ever knew in the Senate, and a few more besides. I do not share the idea that this is a sort of upper house, a sort of club, in which every man has power to hold up the entire country by withholding unanimous consent. I think the first time the House learns that fact the better it will be for the country; the first time it teaches the Senate that it can let an appropriation bill go by the board, if necessary, the better for the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in all seriousness, I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi, my good friend from my native State, if he feels as a Member of this body that any Member of the other House can practically say to us that the House will not accept any amendment of the Senate to a supply bill which increases an appropriation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no, Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, that is what they do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would not say that; I could not say that and remain even tolerably cognizant either of American institutions or of the American Constitution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator once more, and then I shall not do so again. While no Member of the other House has stated that to me—and I want to be entirely frank in this matter—it has come to me indirectly that Members of the House, who are in a position to say what they propose to do, have said that not only has the House of Representatives the right to initiate revenue bills, but they have the right to initiate supply bills, and that they do not propose to accept any amendment of the Senate which does not conform to the ideas of the House as to what those supply bills should be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course the House does not propose to accept any amendments that do not conform to its ideas, except by way of concession and compromise, just as in the case of the Senate; but I do not know who the "young man" in the House is and I do not know how the House happens to assume the position that it has assumed, unless it was because the House differed from the Senate about these questions. I do know, so far as anybody in power being concerned in the matter, that the shoe was on the other foot. I do know that two of the Senate conferees were from States interested in these claims.

Mr. President, the Senator asks me when we are going to get these claims through. If they are just—and so far as I know they may be just; I do not know much about them—why is it that these items are upon an appropriation bill? Senators upon the other side have been lecturing the other House, which has the right to initiate supply bills, a right recognized during the entire history of the country, because they have placed items upon general supply bills that ought to have been in particular bills, and yet there were inserted by the Senate these four claims upon a deficiency bill. Why did not those claims come here as independent bills, so that they could be thrashed out upon their own merits? It is not wrong for the House of Representatives, the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, to put riders upon appropriation bills, but it is wrong for the Senate to do so. The Senators represent nothing but territoriality; and if they are to stand here and lecture the House of Representatives because the latter has put riders upon appropriation bills, with how much more reason could the House lecture us for the same thing? My reply to that argument, then, is that these bills may pass upon their merit, if they have merit. I am rather inclined to think they have, so far as I know anything about them, although I should like to know a little more about them before I vote for them.

Why can we not meet the other House in compromise? The Senator wants to know of me if I would permit one man in the House of Representatives to hold up the Senate. That is not the question. The question is whether you are going to permit one man in the Senate, or three or four men in the Senate, to hold up not only the House, but the Senate, and a supply bill which originates in the House and which is peculiarly the property of the House.

I want, before I sit down, to express the hope that the two Houses of the American National Legislature will not cultivate the habit of each one challenging the other to stay in Washington forever. I see no particular use in that. It seems to me that we can very well afford to compromise with the other House and to recognize that they are at least coordinately our equals. I will go a step further than that, and say that each Member of the House of Representatives is the equal of each Senator and has an equal right, has an absolutely equal right, to avail himself of the Senate unanimous-consent privileges if the House chooses to do it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not mean to question that right or that privilege. If anything, I believe I will go just a little bit further than the Senator from Mississippi in saying that inasmuch as the House of Representatives comes directly from the people they are supposed to represent more nearly than the Senate the wishes of the people. I believe I am willing to go just a little bit further than the Senator from Mississippi and to say that when it comes to a proposition of recognizing the difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives the House comes nearer representing the wishes of the people than the Senate. I know, Mr. President, and the people of this country know, and everybody knows, that the charge made against the Senate of the United States is that they do not represent the people of this country, but that they represent a class, and that class is the wealthy class of this country. I am not willing to admit that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I do not admit that, either.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, wait a moment. My good friend from Mississippi must not gall under the collar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at all; I am just being as amiable as a sweet little cherub, you know. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know, Mr. President, that the charge which has been made against the Senate of the United States that it is a club, a millionaires' club, is unjust. I know the Senate of the United States comes pretty near representing the wishes of the people as well as the House of Representatives does, although one body is elected directly by the people and the other body is elected by the State legislatures.

Take it in my own case. Mr. President, Oregon has taken the lead over any other State in this Union. Oregon has been denominated as the freak State, but Oregon is not the freak State. I want my friend from Mississippi to know that the people of the State of Oregon have just as much intelligence as have the people of the State of Mississippi, and the election of Senators is submitted to a popular vote. So that a Senator under our system is as much the choice of the popular vote as is a Representative in Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday at 2 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate adjourn until 2 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. THORNTON. I move to amend that by making the hour of meeting 12 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. Before the Senator presses that motion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is before the Senate, and it is not debatable.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. PENROSE. For the information of the Senate, I suggest the following order for the consideration of the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his motion?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I withhold it.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know whether the Senate is prepared for it or not, but I submit the following order:

Ordered, That a vote be taken on the report of the conference committee on the deficiency appropriation bill not later than 5 o'clock, without further debate; that immediately thereafter the vote be taken on Senate resolution 386 and pending amendments, without further debate; that the concurrent resolution relative to final adjournment be amended so as to provide for adjournment sine die at 1 o'clock p. m., Monday, August 26, and voted on——

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. At what time?

Mr. PENROSE. At 1 o'clock Monday. The House has adjourned until 12 o'clock, so that we are compelled to adjourn—

That no question of a quorum shall be raised, and that no other business than that herein named shall be transacted by the Senate after adjournment to-night.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to agree to the request, except that part of it which provides that the question of no quorum shall not be raised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes a. m., Sunday, August 25, 1912) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 26, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 24, 1912.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With profound faith in Thee, O God, our Father, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, whose mercy is from everlasting to everlasting, we come with blessings upon our lips for the past and hope in our hearts for the future, that under Thy guidance we may move forward as individuals and as a people to yet higher and grander attainments; that Thy kingdom may come, and Thy will be done, to the honor and glory of Thy holy name, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the general deficiency bill (H. R. 25970) from the Speaker's table, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to take the general deficiency bill from the Speaker's table, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I ask unanimous consent that the conferees be authorized, so far as the House is concerned, to insert in the general deficiency bill, either as an amendment to a Senate amendment or otherwise, a provision which would render available the appropriations already made for the construction of the Panama Canal for the payment of compensation for personal injuries under the Panama Canal act, if they choose to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the House conferees be authorized to agree with the Senate conferees to make at once available from the appropriation for the payment of the Panama Canal expenses the money necessary for the payment of compensation for personal injuries under the Panama Canal act.

Mr. MANN. That is compensation for personal injuries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will announce the conferees on the part of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. CANNON.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the conferees report the conference report may be considered without being printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that when the conference report is handed in it may be considered without being printed in the RECORD under the rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address that I delivered at the unveiling of the Confederate monument erected by the Federal Government in Kansas City.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GEN. JO. O. SHELBY.

An address by Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND, Representative in Congress, at the unveiling of the monument to the Confederate dead, erected by the Federal Government in Union Cemetery, Kansas City, October 22, 1911.

Mr. BORLAND. Every nation has had its civil war and we have had ours. We may thank Heaven that it is over and has left our Nation stronger and more united than ever. The prejudices growing out of that struggle have disappeared from the minds of all good people, and nothing remains except the tenderest sentiments which cluster around the deeds and character of those who took part in the strife. We are here to-day to dedicate a monument erected by the Federal Government to mark the resting place of Confederate dead. The men buried here were not leaders, but were private soldiers who represent only the simple faith and honest courage of those who fought under the Stars and Bars. That the Federal Government recognizes the beautiful and holy sentiment of commemoration which blossoms in the heart of every southern person is a stronger guaranty of peace and unity of the Nation than standing armies or frowning forts.

We have chosen this day for the dedication of this monument because it commemorates also that clear, cold, beautiful Sabbath, 47 years ago, when the blazing tide of war swept over all these hillsides in that tremendous three days' struggle known in history as the Battle of Westport.

I have chosen to say a few words to you to-day in regard to one of the central figures of that great battle, the figure of a southern leader, who is especially near and dear to us here in Kansas City, and whose last remains now rest in Forest Hill Cemetery—Gen. Jo. O. Shelby. Gen. Shelby was a Kentuckian born, one of that indomitable race, so full of initiative and enterprise, which created, as if by magic, an empire of law and civilization in the vast wilderness west of the Mississippi River. He sprang from that Virginia-Kentucky stock which has given so many famous men to American history. He was related to Senator Thomas H. Benton, and was a cousin of two brilliant men who have made such a profound impression on Missouri history, Francis P. Blair and B. Gratz Brown.

Shelby came to Missouri in early manhood and settled in Lafayette County. He married there a daughter of another branch of the Shelby family, a wife who bore with splendid sweetness and courage all the vicissitudes of those stormy years. In 1861, when the storm of Civil War burst over our devoted country, Shelby was a prosperous rope manufacturer at Waverly, in Lafayette County, and was counted a man of wealth and influence. He had just passed his thirtieth year, and had reached that remarkable point in a man's life when all the fire and enterprise of youth is combined with physical vigor and maturity of judgment. Thirty years has been a wonderful age in all history. If a man passes that age without having felt stir within him the Divine spark of enterprise and originality he may as well be content to submit his neck to the yoke of other men's dictation. All the genius of the world has burst its bounds at the magic age of 30 and at that age a man either becomes a leader or sinks back into the ranks of those who are willing to be led. Shelby's sympathies were with the South. He seems to have believed in the southern cause with the fearless faith of his nature. At the very beginning of hostilities Frank Blair, who was then showing his dominating force in the control of affairs at St. Louis, sent for his beloved cousin and offered him a commission in the Army of the Union. Shelby refused and returned to Lafayette County to organize a company of cavalry in the service of the State government of Missouri, of which company he became captain. He was a born cavalry leader, one of those men of dashing courage who never ordered his troops in a charge, but always led them. Military genius is as mysterious as other forms of human genius. It fires the heart and the imagination and creates a feeling of devotion and loyalty which nothing else can inspire. Shelby's men would follow him anywhere and cherished for him an affection and devotion which was almost a reverence. For the next eight years Shelby's career reads like a romance of knight errantry. To detail his military exploits would be to give a complete history of the Civil War west of the Mississippi River. Shelby's company was always in the post of danger, where the work was hardest and the strain the greatest. His little command was summoned to lead the van in all attacks and to cover the rear in every retreat. He seems to have been insensible to toil, privation, and danger, and had the remarkable power of inspiring the same high courage in his men. His forced marches in the saddle, extending long hours without rest or sleep, amid privation and scant supplies and total lack of support, seem hardly credible in these later days when military officers raise such petty complaints over the slightest lack of modern comforts. It was such heroic devotion as that which made the South so formidable in spite of the overwhelming physical handicaps under which it undertook to wage that great war.

In June, 1862, Shelby's commission as captain expired. He was then on the eastern side of the Mississippi, and he determined to return to Lafayette County with a handful of his followers and recruit a regiment. By that time the tide of the Confederacy had been beaten back until practically the whole western bank of the Mississippi was garrisoned by Federal forces. It was necessary for Shelby and his little band to travel nearly a thousand miles through a country not only desolated by war, but watched and patrolled by overwhelming forces of Federal troops. This journey would form a book in itself. He slipped across the Mississippi River under the very guns of the enemy, paused to help with a knightly generosity the pent-up garrisons of southern soldiers that he encountered on the way, threaded his dangerous path through the Union troops and the militia, and arrived safely in Lafayette County to hurl his defiance to the Federal commanders. Daring exploits like this, recorded in history as done in a mere spirit of bravado, have been heralded far and wide, sung in song and story, graced with all the charms of art and literature; but here was a deed done not in bravado, but with a serious purpose to help a cause to which he was devoted. He recruited a thousand farmers in Lafayette County and became the colonel of a cavalry regiment, with which he threaded his way back again to the southern lines. He was not present at the Battle of Lone Jack, on August 16, 1862, but was in the adjoining county recruiting his men and so near as to be almost within sound of the cannon. This is probably the only important engagement upon Missouri soil that was not lighted up by the brilliant flashes of Shelby's genius. Shelby became the commander of a brigade while holding the rank of colonel. There seems to have been considerable hesitation on the part of the Confederate Government at Richmond to advance Shelby to important commands on account of his youth. The other general commanders west of the Mississippi had the advantage of him in age and military training. He followed them with loyalty and respect, and they reposed in him implicit confidence. Gen. Sterling Price was a veteran of the Mexican War and had been major general of the State troops; Gen. John S. Marmaduke was a military graduate of tried ability; the successive southern commanders in charge of the western department, Gens. Van Dorn, Holmes, and others, were closer in touch with the Richmond authorities. However, in March, 1864, Shelby was at length appointed brigadier general. At this time Shelby's brigade was engaged in the fierce work of holding the Red River against an overwhelming Federal force. He was sent with a thousand men to attack and hold in check Gen. Steele, who had a veteran army of 15,000 troops. This fight is so typical of Shelby's military work that it deserves more than a passing comment. Shelby's biographer says:

> Early in the morning the battle began. A veteran of Steele's command once said: "Shelby made them attack the rear of Steele's army of 15,000 men—only a thousand of them—yet they charged as though they had been the vanguard of an army of 30,000. We drove them back, it is true, but they charged again; we drove them back, and they charged again; we drove them back, and they charged again; and thus they charged until night put an end to the remarkable contest."

During this memorable year the fortunes of the Confederacy were rapidly approaching a crisis. The eastern army was being hemmed in on either side, and the authorities at Richmond were watching their feeble resources dwindle away day by day without hope of replenishment. The army west of the Mississippi River could scarcely maintain itself, but it planned and executed that last remarkable invasion known in northern history as Price's raid in Missouri, culminating in the Battle of Westport, which has been aptly described as the "Gettysburg of the West." The army of invasion consisted of about 10,000 men under the command of Gen. Price. The right wing was commanded by John S. Marmaduke, the center by Gen. Fagan with his Arkansas Brigade, and the left by Gen. Shelby. Thus the army and two of its divisions were led by Missourians and were Missouri troops. Gen. Price marched up the eastern section of Missouri and threatened St. Louis. Shelby was in favor of attacking St. Louis, although it was strongly garrisoned and had been, from the beginning of the war, the seat of Federal power. Gen. Price, however, regarded this as beyond the bounds of military judgment and turned westward to attack Jefferson City. By this time Gen. Pleasanton had been summoned from the East and had organized a pursuing force at St. Louis larger than Price's army. Price's effective fighting force probably never equaled 10,000 men, although he seems to have had a large number of unorganized and unarmed recruits or followers. As they passed beyond Jefferson City the pursuit became hotter and the forces behind them accumulated greater strength by the addition of home guards pressed into service by the Federal commander. By this time also Gen. Curtis at Fort Leavenworth had become thoroughly aroused to the imminence of the danger. A state of panic and terror seems to have spread through Kansas, and the authorities undertook to press into service every able-bodied man in the State. Curtis had a well-organized and well-equipped army of about 15,000 men. Gen. Pleasanton's army approaching from the east came in close contact with Price's forces on the 21st of October at the crossing of the Little Blue. Gen. Marmaduke, who held that wing, kept Pleasanton at bay hour after hour and fell back slowly across the Little Blue and into Independence and the county to the south of it. On the 22d of October the struggle had reached the crossing of the Big Blue. It was necessary for Shelby to force the crossing of the Big Blue to provide an outlet for Price's army and prevent them being trapped by Gen. Pleasanton.

The Big Blue had been strongly intrenched upon its western bank by Curtis's entire force. In addition to this, the stream had been choked by trees felled by the men of Gen. Blair's command; the bridges had been burned and the passage otherwise obstructed, but the reckless courage of Shelby's brigade hurled back the Federal forces, and by the night of the 22d of October Curtis had retreated into Kansas City with one outlying brigade in the village of Westport and another one driven clear over into Kansas at Shawneetown. All of the country south of Westport, those beautiful rolling hills, where the Country Club now stands and which is being adorned by the architectural beauty and taste of the Kansas City homes, was in the control of Shelby. His troops held back the forces under Curtis to the north, as well as the Kansas militia to the west. When day dawned on the 23d of October Curtis took his stand on the roof of the Harris House, in Westport, from which he could survey the field. He ordered his brigades into action against Shelby, but it was nearly noon before he could shake the lines in front of him, although he hurled against them overwhelming numbers. In fact, during the morning one company of Shelby's command forced its way across Brush Creek and started up the north bank toward the village of Westport. This was the high-water mark of the Confederates west of the Mississippi. It may some time be marked by a stone similar to the stone which marks the high tide of the Confederates on that other three days' battle field at Gettysburg. By noon of the 23d the splendid army of Pleasanton had pounded the position of Gen. Marmaduke until it had forced the crossing of the Big Blue. Marmaduke could no longer hold back the swelling tide of that well-equipped and superior force. As he fell back toward the south and west, both flanks of Shelby's brigade were exposed. Shelby's west flank was exposed to the entire line of Kansas, his east flank was left exposed by the falling back of Marmaduke and Fagan, and his front was receiving the tremendous pounding of all of Curtis's army. It is said that Gen. Price sent word to Shelby to retreat. Shelby sent back word that he could not retreat without reenforcements; that if his men once took a step backward they would be overwhelmed and shot down to the last man. Nevertheless, he succeeded in drawing off his forces and bringing them out of the trap in which they were caught, and stubbornly fought every foot of ground from Brush Creek to Dodson. When night fell on the 23d Price's supply train had passed on its way to the south, and Shelby with his tired and decimated troops, without supplies and without ammunition, was left in the open to guard the road that leads up from Dodson to the crest of the hill beyond. The whole safety of the Southern Army in its retreat to the south depended upon Shelby's watchfulness in holding this position, and it seems extremely doubtful whether it would have been within human power to hold it against the united armies which Pleasanton and Curtis could have hurled against it. However, Shelby did hold it, and Price got away safely to the south, to the intense astonishment and disgust of the authorities in Washington and those of the eastern part of the country, who seemed hardly able to believe how Price could have escaped from the position in which he was caught when the two armies of Pleasanton and Curtis succeeded in coming together.

I need not rehearse for you the bitter experiences of the retreat southward, when daily and almost nightly the exhausted and ill-furnished troops of Shelby were required to protect the rear and hold back the rapidly accumulating force of the Federal pursuit. It is one long series of desperate charges and forlorn hopes, with scarcely an interval for rest or refreshment until the 800 miles were covered and the little fragment was safely across the Red River into Texas. This ended the war in the West.

In the spring of 1865 Shelby and his men were as full of fight as though the Civil War had just begun. He was bitterly opposed to the surrender when the news came of the fall of Lee's army. It seems that he was even bold and outspoken in his insurrection against his commander when it was proposed to surrender the army of the west. He had formed a plan to put his superior officer under arrest and take charge of the Confederate forces and continue the war. Nevertheless Gen. Buckner surrendered to the Federal forces at Shreveport, and Shelby upon mature consideration decided not to endanger the defenseless noncombatants by an attack upon the city. He therefore marched away through Texas with a thousand volunteer recruits on his way to Mexico. At that time the Austrian archduke, supported by the soldiers of France, was on the throne of Mexico under the title of Emperor Maximilian. His beautiful wife Carlotta, who is still living, was one of the most romantic characters of history. Maximilian himself seems to have been a man of good character, but without force or ability. A vigorous revolution was in progress among the Mexican people under the leadership of the patriot Juarez. Shelby, the unconquered and unreconciled, purposed to march into Mexico and continue there his military career. When he reached the Mexican border he was offered an important command in the army of Juarez. This proposal he laid before his officers, but they decided by a general vote to cast their fortunes with Maximilian. They seemed to have been influenced in this decision by the fact that Juarez was supposed to be supported by the moral influence of the Government at Washington. Shelby therefore declined the offer of Juarez and thereby placed a hostile force between himself and the Mexican capital, through which he must march his little command if he expected to reach the armies of Maximilian.

On the 4th day of July, 1865, occurred one of the most pathetic and touching scenes in the career of Shelby and his command. On that day they buried in the waters of the Rio Grande River the battle flag of Shelby's brigade, the unconquered and uncaptured flag that had been carried away in the very face of a commander surrounded by overwhelming forces. There are so many romantic features of Shelby's career that it tempts one to linger upon them. Shelby marched his men through all the difficulties and dangers of a strange and hostile country to the capital city of Mexico, where he offered his services to Maximilian. He assured Maximilian that he could raise from among the disbanded armies of the South 40,000 experienced veterans who could save the army of Mexico. He pointed out to Maximilian that there was not a single regiment under the Emperor's command, not even his household troops, that he could trust; that as soon as the support of the French troops was withdrawn he would be at the mercy of a band of traitors. Maximilian refused Shelby's offer and thereby sealed his own fate. We are tempted to speculate on how the history of our continent might have been changed if Maximilian had decided otherwise. He treated Shelby with great consideration and gave him a concession of land upon which was founded the American colony of Carlotta, named in honor of the beautiful Empress. When the French troops were withdrawn two years later the crash came. Maximilian's young, beautiful, and cultured bride started alone through nameless perils to the seacoast and to Europe to appeal for foreign aid. Maximilian himself marched with unflinching courage, but with a total lack of judgment, into the hands of his traitorous troops and went down to his tragic fate. The unfortunate country passed through the scourge of civil war with all its after results of lawlessness and crime.

In later years Shelby was again a resident of Missouri, and when I had the honor of his personal acquaintance he had been appointed United States marshal of the western district of Missouri under President Cleveland. He was then a quiet, dignified little gentleman of kindly manners, with a grave face and a long white beard. The storms of his career had left no marks upon him except a mellow and settled kindliness of spirit. I remember being in the United States court at Kansas City one morning when a young boy, scarcely of age, pleaded guilty to some petty crime against the post office. When he was sentenced he was turned over by the judge in the usual course to the marshal. Gen. Shelby went up to lead the young man away to his punishment. Instead of seizing him by the arm the general put his arm around the young fellow's shoulders and drew him gently toward him, and with a sudden impulse toward a sympathetic heart, the young fellow turned around and buried his head on the general's shoulder and burst into tears. In 20 years of practice I have never before or since seen an officer of the law and his prisoner in such a relation.

Shelby, in his capacity as a United States marshal, took the customary oath to support the Constitution of the United States; an oath which time had convinced him was right and was to the best interests of himself, his family, and his country. He closed his career in honor and in the confidence and love of his neighbors, and lies buried in Forest Hill Cemetery in Kansas City. It would rejoice his heart to be present to-day and to see the Federal Government, which he took an oath to support, extending in a spirit of liberality this splendid testimonial to these humble soldiers that lie buried here. To be great and brave is also to be magnanimous, and this is true of governments as it is of men. The great Federal Government loses nothing in strength or dignity and gains much in affection and loyalty by this tribute to the holy sentiments of the southern people.

PAYMENT OF AUGUST SALARIES TO HOUSE AND SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 360.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of August, 1912, on the day of adjournment of the present session; and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized to pay on said day to Members and Delegates their allowances for clerk hire for the said month of August, notwithstanding said Members and Delegates may not have designated by name their clerks for and during said month of August.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to provide payment of August salaries on adjournment to the House employees and the Senate employees. I ask that the rules be suspended and that the resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to suspend the rules.

Mr. LLOYD. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question about the resolution.

Mr. LLOYD. I stated the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this House joint resolution?

Mr. LLOYD. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. I could not hear the reading of the resolution, and I wanted to ask the gentleman if it simply provides that the payment can be made or is it compulsory?

Mr. LLOYD. It provides for the payment to-day instead of the last day of the month.

Mr. MANN. Not to-day.

Mr. LLOYD. It provides that it shall be paid on the day of adjournment, and I take it that we will adjourn to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. If we did not adjourn until after the payment was to be made under the general law, would this make it necessary that the payment should be held up until we did adjourn?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri will yield to me——

Mr. LLOYD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the resolution provides that the clerk hire shall be paid to Members notwithstanding they have not furnished the names of the clerks to the Clerk of the House. In that connection, in order to clear up the matter for the information of the Members of the House, I desire to make an inquiry as to what is the effect of the provision in the legislative bill in reference to furnishing to the Clerk of the House the names of the clerks of Members?

Mr. LLOYD. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the comptroller has given an informal opinion, both to myself and to the Clerk of the House, that the provision in the legislative bill provides that the allowance for clerk hire shall be paid to the Members of Congress as heretofore, provided they have first filed with the Clerk of the House the name or names of the clerks employed by them. This resolution, because of the absence of many Members from the House and the fact that the matter has not been called to their attention, provides that the clerk hire for the month of August shall be paid to Members, regardless of whether they have filed the names of their clerks with the Clerk of the House or not. But hereafter the payment will not be made to Members until they have first filed with the Clerk of the House the names of the persons employed by them.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does that involve this matter: Take next month, for instance. Suppose the Member does not file the name of his clerk until the middle of the month. Under the opinion of the comptroller, would he be entitled to the proportionate amount of clerk hire for that portion of the month not covered by the name being filed? And if there is any question about it, I want to suggest that, not by direction, but of his own motion, the Clerk of the House send notices to every Member of the House calling his attention to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Clerk of the House is printing 1,500 notices, which are to be sent to Members, both at their residences and at such other places as they may be supposed to be sojourning temporarily.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, from a hasty glance at the provision, a Member can designate one, two, or three, as he may choose to do, and can change the designation at any time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At any time. My recollection of the communication of the comptroller is that before the money can be paid to the Member the designation must be made, but there is nothing in it that says that it must be made at the beginning of the month.

Mr. MANN. I suspect that that was not brought to his attention. I did not know that the comptroller had held that the designation must be made——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The comptroller did not give an opinion, but he expressed his belief.

Mr. MANN. And he might hold, after that, that if a Member had not designated his clerk he could not receive any clerk hire during the time when the clerk was not designated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I doubt whether that construction can be placed upon it.

Mr. CANDLER. Suppose the name of the clerk was not furnished until the middle of the month; would he get his pay for that portion of the month?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what we are discussing. The statute provides that the names of those employed must be filed with the Clerk.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me in the notices sent out by the Clerk, it would be well for the Clerk to state that where Members designate the clerks two or three days after the first of the month, that the designation shall be from the first of the month.

Mr. KENDALL. Make it retroactive.

Mr. MANN. Yes; from the 1st of September.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the regular order. The regular order is on agreeing to the conference report on the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MOON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ADULTERATED SEEDS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House the bill (H. R. 22340) to regulate foreign commerce by prohibiting the admission into the United States of certain adulterated seeds, and seeds unfit for seeding purposes, with Senate amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill H. R. 22340, with Senate amendments thereto, and the Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will not now renew the objection to the request I made last evening, that to-day it may be in order for the Speaker to recognize Members who have bills on the Private Calendar to call them up by unanimous consent for consideration when it does not interfere with the public business. I renew that request, that order to continue in force until 2 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when it does not interfere with the transaction of necessary public business the Chair be authorized to recognize gentlemen to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar up until 2 o'clock p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I stated yesterday that there were some half dozen or more resolutions with reference to printing that I have promised to bring up in the House. I take it that this request will not interfere with them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman that if these are privileged resolutions that request would not interfere with them.

The SPEAKER. Are all of them privileged?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Of course it would not interfere. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE DEATH OF JAMES W. RODGERS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read House resolution 705, and move that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 705.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives all information that may be in his possession or the possession of the Department of State in regard to the alleged killing of James W. Rodgers, an American citizen, by British soldiers in Africa, and to inform the House of Representatives what action, if any, has been taken or is contemplated to investigate the killing of the said James W. Rodgers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order on the resolution. I would like to inquire what good it would do to pass a resolution of that sort at this time, when the Secretary of State or the President will not probably have much opportunity of replying until next fall?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to my friend from Illinois I will say the State Department has no objection to the passage of this resolution. An investigation is being made concerning the death of Rodgers in the African jungle. All the facts will be ascertained, and we hope the State Department will be able to report to Congress when it meets in December. The truth of the circumstances of Rodgers's death should be known.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that Congress would be a great deal wiser to pass the resolution, if it is desired, in December, when the House itself probably has more information. I can understand the motive in introducing the resolution, and if it were possible to get a report now——

Mr. SULZER. The resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and I say that there is no objection to the passage of the resolution so far as the Committee on Foreign Affairs is concerned. For some time the State Department has been trying to get correct information regarding the death of this man Rodgers from the Belgium Government and also from the English Government. If he was killed, we want to know it and all the facts in connection therewith. I do not care to discuss the case now. We institute by adopting this resolution an official inquiry to find out the truth—that is all. I am informed the State Department on its own motion has instituted a rigid inquiry. This resolution will back up the State Department.

Mr. MANN. Well, that could not have occupied a great deal of time, because he just died.

Mr. SULZER. No; he died, or was killed, last year—in November, I believe. Some English officer in charge apparently of the English expedition in Africa has recently made an official report to the English Government.

Mr. MANN. If he was killed last November, the newspapers are unusually slow.

Mr. SULZER. The information came to the newspapers from this report which the English officer recently sent to the authorities of the English Government and——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say that while it is true, as the gentleman from Illinois says, that if this resolution is passed now we can not get a reply until next December, yet, if I understand the situation aright, the passage of this resolution would give the State Department a better basis for making an investigation in the meantime than they would have without it.

Mr. SULZER. That is quite true.

Mr. GARRETT. Why?

Mr. NORRIS. Because they have been asking for information that applies to the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. KENDALL. The State Department is now prosecuting an inquiry?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the State Department will do everything it can to get the information that is sought.

Mr. SULZER. I said that, and I have stated that I have conferred with the officials of the State Department about it. I hope the resolution will pass. There should be no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Was this resolution reported from the committee through the basket?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. It was reported unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. That is what I thought. Of course, that would take away its privilege, although I shall not insist on the point of order.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SULZER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

RIGHT OF WAY, FORT SHAFTER MILITARY RESERVATION, TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 7377.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 7377) granting a right of way through the Fort Shafter Military Reservation, Territory of Hawaii, to the Pearl Harbor Traction Co. (Ltd.), and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That to connect the waters of Pearl Harbor, the naval station, and the Fort Kamehameha Military Reservation, and wharf thereon, with the Fort Shafter Military Reservation and with the street railway system of the city of Honolulu, there be, and is hereby, granted to the Pearl Harbor Traction Co. (Ltd.), a common carrier corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Territory of Hawaii, and to its successors and assigns, a right of way 40 feet in width through the Fort Shafter Military Reservation, upon such route as shall be approved by the Secretary of War, and subject to such rules and regulations in the interests of good order, police, sanitation, and discipline as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe, but no part of the right of way shall be used for storage of rolling stock or material. The United States shall be entitled to the following easements along or upon the entire right of way of the company now owned or hereafter acquired: (a) For the construction of a Government telegraph line and Government telephone line, using, if desired for such purposes, the standing poles of the company, and (b) of a water-pipe line for Government use; but all such construction, and the operation and maintenance thereof, shall be so conducted as to interfere as little as possible with the construction, operation, and maintenance of the railroad. And said company shall, upon written notice from the Secretary of War, and within a reasonable time, construct, operate, and maintain all such spur and side tracks as may be necessary to serve the reserve storehouses to be built upon the Fort Shafter Reservation by the United States adjacent to said company's line of road, and shall also operate its cars thereto upon any tracks constructed by the United States, and shall erect and maintain on said reservation a suitable passenger shelter and a local freight shelter at such points as may be designated by the Secretary of War. Upon the construction by the United States of such reserve storehouses the said Pearl Harbor Traction Co. (Ltd.) will construct, on a right of way to be acquired by it for the purpose, an extension of its lines to connect with the Government tracks on the Fort Kamehameha Military Reservation, and will operate its cars on such Government tracks, subject to such rules and regulations in the interests of good order, police, sanitation, and discipline as the department commander may from time to time prescribe. In the construction of the railroad upon the Fort Shafter Reservation such earth or other material excavated and not needed therefor shall be deposited on the reservation at such places as may be designated by the commanding officer at Fort Shafter. The said company shall transport free of charge upon its regular passenger cars between the passenger station at Fort Shafter and the terminus on such reservation of the present street car system of Honolulu all through passengers coming from or going to any point on the lines of the said system.

SEC. 2. That Congress may permit any other person or corporation hereafter acquiring a franchise for the operation of a steam, electric, or other railroad on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, to use the tracks, spurs, sidings, and other construction herein authorized on said reservation upon payment to the Pearl Harbor Traction Co. (Ltd.) of just compensation for such use. And whenever said right of way hereby granted shall cease to be used by said company the same shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 3. That the powers herein granted are limited to a period of 50 years, unless sooner altered, amended, or repealed by Congress.

SEC. 4. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield?

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It was stated here on the floor the other day, on another bill granting a right of way through a military reservation, that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House had adopted a fixed policy of granting only a revocable license instead of an actual grant. I notice in the House bill referring to this same matter the committee recommended an amendment striking out all of the original bill and proposing to insert an amendment in the main the same as the Senate bill, but providing for a revocable right of way, while the Senate bill leaves out the word "revocable," and I propose, unless the gentleman does so, to offer an amendment to insert the word "revocable," so as to carry out what was said to be the fixed policy of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I was going to call the attention of the House to that fact myself. Now, this bill has been reported unanimously by both committees; and not only is that true, but it is recommended and the bill was prepared by the Secretary of War, and the Government gets certain rights under this bill, as well as the grantee of the right of way. I will not object in the least to have the bill amended so as to correspond exactly with the House bill, and I will either make the motion to insert or the gentleman from Illinois can do it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I move to insert—I do not know just what line it comes in.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. In the Senate bill it will come in line 10.

Mr. MANN. Amend line 10 of the Senate bill by inserting before the words "right of way" the word "revocable."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 10, by inserting before the words "right of way" the word "revocable."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the amended bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will ask to have a similar House bill, H. R. 17481, laid on the table.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. I will do so. It is H. R. 17481.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

RALPH I. SASSE, ELLICOTT H. FREELAND, TATTNALL D. SIMKINS, AND JAMES D. CHRISTIAN.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up the Senate joint resolution No. 99, being a resolution authorizing the President to reassemble the court-martial which, on August 16, 1911, tried Ralph I. Sasse, Ellicott H. Freeland, Tattnall D. Simpkins, and James D. Christian, cadets, of the Corps of Cadets of the United States Military Academy, and sentenced them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman where that is, in a parliamentary way?

Mr. RODDENBERY. This meritorious resolution, Mr. Speaker, has passed the Senate, was regularly referred to the House Military Committee, reported favorably in its exact form to the House, and is now on the House Calendar without amendment. It was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar on the last unanimous-consent day, and when called up was objected out. On account of the imminent adjournment the time has not elapsed when it could be properly placed, and reached again, on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I desire, as an emergency matter affecting these young men, to get it called up by unanimous consent now and have it passed at this time.

Mr. MANN. Is this on the calendar?

Mr. RODDENBERY. It is on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Under what rule does the gentleman expect to get it up?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Under the rule that the House can do anything by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the House just decided it was going to take up these private bills.

Mr. RODDENBERY. This is a private bill, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that, but the Chair wants to carry out the unanimous-consent rule fairly. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Would the Chair recognize me to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not, because you can not make that motion except on the first and third Mondays.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It could not be called up under the rule that we are now within six days of adjournment?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; because there is not a man on earth who knows we are within six days of adjournment.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I regret very much not to get this up at this session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets it, too, but has to enforce the rules of the House.

Mr. JAMES. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JAMES. Has not the gentleman from Georgia the right to ask unanimous consent for consideration of that resolution?

The SPEAKER. Because the House in its wisdom established a Unanimous Consent Calendar, and while it did not in terms take away from the Speaker the power to recognize people at any time for the purpose of unanimous consent, that was the intention of it.

Mr. JAMES. I had always been under the impression that unanimous consent would permit almost anything to be done in the House.

The SPEAKER. It would if it was not the clear intent of the House in passing that rule that such a thing should not happen. Not very long ago, I will state to the gentleman—I do not know whether he was here or not—there were certain little matters hanging around here that nobody could get up under the ordinary machinery of the House or the extraordinary machinery either, all of which matters, if they were not attended to at once, would cause the United States Government to lose money. One evening the Speaker, in the goodness of his heart, concluded to let three or four of these gentlemen in with a bill, and after he had done it a dozen Members of the House got up and elaborately served notice on the House that they were going to object thereafter, and did not propose to go back to the old system which had been discarded.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this resolution is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I am not a member, I hope the Speaker will permit me to say that the chairman of the committee is temporarily absent and that the gentleman from Florida, Mr. CLARK, and the gentleman from Florida, Mr. SPARKMAN, and the gentleman from Delaware, Mr. HEALD, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. GLASS, are interested in the resolution, and we desire to call it up as an emergency matter, if it can be done. While the chairman of the committee ordinarily should call it up, I hope no point will be claimed in that respect.

The SPEAKER. Nobody made any objection on that head.

HOOKWORM AND SOIL POLLUTION.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the present consideration of the following privileged resolution:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 27.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Senate document room 2,000 copies, on manila paper, of a wall chart on "Hookworm and Soil Pollution."

Mr. FINLEY. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the report also be read. (H. Rept. 1251.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FINLEY, from the Committee on Printing, makes the following report, to accompany Senate concurrent resolution 27:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 27) providing for the printing of 2,000 copies of a wall chart on Hookworm and Soil Pollution, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to with the following amendment: On line 3, after the word "copies," insert the following: "and for the use of the House document room, 5,000 copies."

The estimated cost will be $1,889.70.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] what will be the cost of the printing of this document?

Mr. FINLEY. It is stated in the report. It will be $1,800, I think.

Mr. CULLOP. What is the purpose of it—for distribution through the document room?

Mr. FINLEY. It is a report on the treatment and eradication of the hookworm.

Mr. CULLOP. Is it for distribution by Members of Congress from the document room?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; from the document room.

Mr. CULLOP. How many copies are to be printed?

Mr. MANN. Five thousand for the use of the House, is it not?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. How many for the use of the Senate, if any?

Mr. MANN. Two thousand, I believe.

Mr. CULLOP. Making 7,000 in all?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I think that is it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] if this is a privileged resolution?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I supposed that possibly the hookworm was privileged in the Senate, but I did not know it was privileged in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. FINLEY. I will not bring up any resolution that is not privileged. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the copies of this document go into the document room or into the folding room?

Mr. FOSTER. Why not put them in the folding room?

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Illinois is aware of the fact that this is a disease that does not prevail all over the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I am; but I think it is a pretty good plan to distribute the document through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate concurrent resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PARASITES OF GYPSY MOTH AND BROWN-TAIL MOTH.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 49 (H. Rept. 1248).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of the publication issued by the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture (Bul. No. 91), entitled "The Importation into the United States of the Parasites of the Gypsy Moth and the Brown-Tail Moth," by L. O. Howard and W. F. Fiske, of which 3,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, to be distributed through the Senate document room, and 6,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the House document room.

The report (by Mr. FINLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 49) providing for the printing of 10,000 copies of the publication issued by the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture, entitled "The Importation into the United States of the Parasites of the Gypsy Moth and the Brown-Tail Moth," report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $3,130.04.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the resolution speaks for itself.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE COTTON WORM OR CATERPILLAR.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for present consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 685 (H. Rept. 1249).

Resolved, That 70,000 copies of Bulletin No. 164, August 1, 1912, Alabama Agricultural Experiment Station of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn, Ala., entitled "The Cotton Worm or Caterpillar," be printed for the use of the House document room.

The report (by Mr. FINLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 685) providing for the printing of 70,000 copies of a bulletin of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute entitled "The Cotton Worm or Caterpillar," reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $496.75.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The resolution was agreed to.

VIOLATIONS OF ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 63 (H. Rept. 1246).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 25,000 copies of the majority and minority reports of the committee authorized under House resolution 148 to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890 and other acts be printed for the use of the House document room.

The report (by Mr. FINLEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 63) providing for the printing of 25,000 copies of the majority and minority reports of the committee authorized to investigate violations of the antitrust acts, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $2,302.58.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina if this document also is to go through the document room?

Mr. FINLEY. This resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and it provides that the document shall go to the House document room.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the gentleman willing to offer an amendment providing that these reports shall be distributed through the folding room?

Mr. FINLEY. I am perfectly willing. I move to strike out the words "document room" in line 6, so that it will read "be printed for the use of the House."

Mr. FOSTER. That will send it to the folding room?

Mr. FINLEY. That will send it to the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understand that we printed of the hearings on the Stanley investigation in the neighborhood of five to ten thousand copies. I do not know, perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts can inform us, whether the same people who obtained the hearings have already received the report printed by the direction of the committee.

Mr. FINLEY. The Committee on Printing did not handle that proposition. The matter was called up on the floor of the House.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but what I was getting at is this: Having sent out copies of the hearings from a list in the hands of the Stanley special committee, I take it that the committee would desire to send the report to the same persons who received the hearings, and if they have not already been sent I think the resolution ought to be amended so as to give the members of the special committee a certain number of copies.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I think it ought to be divided up. I do not think they all ought to go to the folding room. As a matter of fact, the demand which each individual Member of the House is going to get is comparatively small. They have got them already, for the most part. The distribution of the reports will mostly come on the Stanley committee; on myself as being the senior minority member and on Mr. STANLEY as being the chairman of the committee. I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] knew what he wanted, and he wants to send them out to the people who have had the copies of the hearings, college libraries, economic libraries, newspapers, and bodies of all sorts. The gentleman from Kentucky wants the report to go where the hearings have already gone. In order to do that he must have a large supply in the document room upon which he can draw. I myself, as the gentleman knows, have had a great many minority reports printed at my own expense.

Mr. FOSTER. Could it not be arranged this way, so that so many shall be placed in the folding room and the others go to the document room?

Mr. MANN. Yes; let 15,000 go to the document room and 10,000 to the credit of Members in the folding room.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting after the word "printed," in line 5, the words "ten thousand," so that it would read "10,000 for the use of the House"; and then after the word "House," in line 6, insert "15,000 for."

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the resolution as it will read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 25,000 copies of the majority and minority reports of the committee authorized under House resolution 148 to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890 and other acts, be printed, 10,000 for the use of the House and 15,000 for the document room.

Mr. FOSTER. Under that resolution they would all go through the document room.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Ten thousand would not go to the folding room.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it should provide that 10,000 should go through the folding room.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, why not make it read "25,000 for the use of the House, 10,000 to be distributed through the folding room and 15,000 through the document room"?

Mr. FINLEY. After the word "House," I move to insert the words "of which 15,000 shall be distributed through the folding room and 10,000 shall be distributed through the document room."

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Fifteen thousand through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "House," 25,000 for the use of the House, of which 15,000 shall be distributed through the folding room and 10,000 through the document room.

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Speaker, I understood the amendment provided for 15,000 through the document room, and the amendment provides for the distribution of 10,000 through the document room.

Mr. FINLEY. I will state that there will be considerable demand on the Membership of the House, and I think that is a proper division.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amended resolution was agreed to.

BIOGRAPHICAL CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged Senate concurrent resolution 26, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 26 (H. Rept. 1255).

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 copies of Senate document numbered 654, Sixty-first Congress, second session, entitled "Biographical Congressional Directory," of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken, and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

SOIL SURVEY OF RANDOLPH COUNTY, ALA.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged House resolution 695, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 695 (H. Rept. 1250).

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of a bulletin issued by the Bureau of Soils, Department of Agriculture, entitled "A Soil Survey of Randolph County, Ala.," be printed for the use of the House document room.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 695) providing for the printing of 1,000 copies of a bulletin issued by the Bureau of Soils, Department of Agriculture, entitled "A Soil Survey of Randolph County, Ala.," reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $194.60.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, this soil survey is in my congressional district, in the county of Randolph. There are about 3,000 farmers who are voters in that county. Under the provisions of the general act we get only 2,000 copies. The soil survey has been completed and I have only 2,000 copies to distribute in the county. It requires 1,000 more to supply the people of that county. I introduced this resolution for the purpose of furnishing a copy of this soil survey which was made by the Department of Agriculture, a valuable document, to the people of the county, and I think it entirely fair to them that each one have a copy instead of giving copies to only 2,000 and leaving each one of 1,000 without a copy.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Do I understand that Randolph County is in the gentleman's district?

Mr. HEFLIN. It is.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. And it has an important bearing on the gentleman coming here next year?

Mr. HEFLIN. It is my native county, I will state, and the people of that county are very enterprising, industrious——

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. And will the gentleman also add intelligent?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; and for quite a number of years they have expressed very excellent judgment in the selection of their Member of Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. They are to be congratulated upon that fact.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SOIL SURVEY OF CADDO PARISH, LA.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged House concurrent resolution 38, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 38 (H. Rept. 1252).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be reprinted 5,000 additional copies of the Soil Survey of Caddo Parish, La., for the use of the House document room.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 38) providing for the printing of 5,000 copies of the Soil Survey of Caddo Parish, La., reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to with the following amendment:

On line 2 strike out the word "five" and insert the word "two."

The estimated cost will be $987.96.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MINERS' STRIKE, WESTMORELAND COUNTY, PA.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged House resolution, H. Res. 683, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 683 (H. Rept. 1247).

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of House of Representatives Document No. 847, entitled "Report on the Miners' Strike in Bituminous Coal Field in Westmoreland County, Pa., in 1910 and 1911," be printed for the use of the House document room.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 683) providing for the printing of 5,000 copies of House Document No. 847, entitled "Report on the Miners' Strike in Bituminous Coal Field in Westmoreland County, Pa., in 1910 and 1911," reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $472.80.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, where is this to be distributed? Through the document room?

The SPEAKER. Through the document room.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to raise any question about it, but I notice, I think, what is a very natural tendency, that whereas formerly nearly every document printed was distributed through the folding room, now a good many resolutions for the printing of documents that are in the main, if not purely, for the benefit of an individual Member of Congress are to be distributed through the document room.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that in every publication here for the printing of which a resolution is introduced some one is interested. I am not prepared to admit that Members of Congress make use of means of this sort to help themselves politically. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. I am not asserting anything of the sort. I do not think any Member of Congress would do anything at all that was improper to help himself politically. There are a great many who seem not to know enough to help themselves politically by doing the right thing, much less the wrong, and I do not know that I am not one of those. Yet, if I want to send out anything into my district which is purely personal I find that I have to put it in the form of a speech and pay for its printing.

Mr. FINLEY. This contains information which I think will be of some value.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, let me say to my colleague that I know a little something about this riot condition in Westmoreland County, Pa. It was investigated by an official of the Government, as the gentleman knows, and there were a great many charges made there back and forth. There was a good deal of rioting, and an investigation was made by the Committee on Rules, and it was afterwards taken up by the Government officials, in reference to the location of a post office on the mining company's property.

Mr. MANN. Well, this investigation must have been made before my distinguished colleague from Illinois was on the Committee on Rules if it was made in 1910.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not know it was made in 1910.

Mr. MANN. I understood it was made in 1910–11.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will pardon me, the riot occurred, or the trouble, strike, in 1910, and the investigation was made subsequent to that time.

Mr. MANN. That may be. To be perfectly candid, I did not know there was a riot or strike there.

Mr. FOSTER. There were quite a number of people killed.

Mr. MANN. I do not endeavor to keep track of everybody in the country who is killed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FINLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several resolutions were passed was laid on the table.

PROTEST AGAINST BEER SELLING, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement from the Scientific Temperance Federation, showing the deleterious effect of alcohol and beer upon soldiers and protesting against the reestablishment of the Army canteen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the same one that was printed in the Senate proceedings the other day?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it has been printed before.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who is the author of this interesting article?

Mr. WEBB. There are about 100 distinguished physicians of America, and the first one is Francis G. Benedict, Ph. D., director, institution of nutrition, Carnegie Institution, Boston.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Any from New Jersey?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I think there are a good many from New Jersey.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. All right; I have no objection.

Mr. KINDRED. What was the gentleman's request?

Mr. WEBB. To print a statement in relation to the deleterious effects of alcohol and beer upon soldiers.

Mr. KINDRED. I hope it will go through.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

To the honorable the Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned physicians respectfully but earnestly protest to your honorable bodies against the passage of any bill to reestablish beer selling in the United States Army.

A study of the Army statistics during the present nonbeer period as compared with the previous beer-selling period shows:

First. That the average admission rate for alcoholism in the Army has been lower during the nonbeer period (1901–1910).

Second. That although the average admission rate for venereal disease has been higher during the nonbeer period than in the preceding beer-selling period, the greatest increase took place in the beer period immediately after the Spanish War. The increase between the first and the last year of that period was 106 per cent. The increase in the nonbeer period was 19 per cent at the highest point reached by the venereal rate, which was seven years ago (1905).

In other words, beer, which is now advocated as a preventive of venereal diseases, failed in the beer-selling period to prevent an increase nearly six times as great as the increase during the nonbeer period.

Third. It is not only in the state of drunkenness that men step into danger of incurring venereal diseases, but in the state of exhilaration and weakened self-control which follows the use of comparatively small amounts of alcoholic liquors. Modern scientific investigation has shown clearly that one of the earliest effects of the use of alcoholic liquors is impaired self-control. This impairment of self-control not only follows the use of the stronger alcoholic liquors, but may also follow the use of beer.

Fourth. Army tests conducted by generals and Army medical officers have repeatedly shown the disadvantage not only of the spirits drinker, but of even the beer drinker, in health, endurance, morale, and marksmanship—the qualities which are especially necessary for the efficiency of the soldier.

In view of the foregoing facts, we respectfully submit that science and experience indicate that the sale of beer in the Army is not only not required to diminish venereal diseases, but that its reinstatement would conflict with the best interests of the soldier himself, physically and morally, both in the Army and when he returns to civil life, and that it would be in direct opposition to the highest efficiency of the Army as a means of national defense.

We therefore respectfully urge you not to pass any bill for the reestablishment of beer selling in the Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, the bill is a bill for the relief of 10 different individuals who entered certain lands in California. At the time they entered it the Land Office and all others believed it open to entry. Afterwards it turned out that it was part of a forest reserve. Before that was determined they spent a good deal of money in making entry. The bill originally asked that it be restored to entry, and they should get patent for it, but the Committee on Public Lands did not see it that way, but recommended that they be given back their actual and necessary expenses in and about the matter of entry. The Senate bill provides for that. This is about all there is to be said, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a brief statement? The fact is that these 10 people, most of whom are strangers to me, some in the States of Washington, Oregon, and California, three or four years ago went to the Eureka California land district to make timber and stone filings upon any vacant land they might find there. They employed a locator at about $150 apiece who took them and showed them vacant public lands. They went to the land office at Eureka and made filings. The register and receiver advised these people that the lands were vacant.

They then went back three months later and made their final proofs, employed their witnesses, and paid $400 apiece and got their final receipts. Some two years later they received notice to show cause why their entries should not be canceled because of their alleged erroneous allowance. Prior to the date they made their entries an order was made here in Wishington, but not spread on the local records, withdrawing certain lands, including these. Now, these people were not in fault in any way. It was a mistake of the General Land Office at Washington when it made an order withdrawing these lands from entry that it did not send the order to the Eureka Land Office so as to notify the public. The General Land Office admits its mistake, admits these people are out this money. So the people came here and had a bill introduced in the Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN to give them their patents notwithstanding this order of withdrawal. But the department made objection and said:

We do not believe they should have patents; that this land is now in a forest reserve, and we suggest they be relieved by paying them back the $400 they paid the Government and filing fees and their actual necessary expenses, to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Now, let me see if I know any of the facts in this case. An error was made in the office in Washington in reference to this land being withdrawn as a forest reservation, and people supposed they had the right to make a claim or entry upon it. They had employed somebody, apparently, to look out for their interests. If they won, they would pay $400 or $500 for a piece of land which had on it from 5,000 to 10,000 feet of merchantable timber per acre. In one case Lieut. Col. Rudolph G. Ebert, United States Army, would receive a piece of land having on it 3,000,000 feet, board measure, of red fir; 500,000 feet, board measure, sugar pine; and 500,000 feet, board measure, yellow pine. And Mr. William M. Godfrey would receive a piece of land having on it 1,000,000 feet, board measure, yellow pine; 2,980,760 feet, board measure, fir; and 440,000 feet, board measure, sugar pine; and 374,440 feet, board measure, of cedar—valued, as it stands on the ground, at over $8,000. Do not gentlemen think when a man endeavors to make a gamble on obtaining a piece of land, with timber on it worth $8,000, by paying $400 or $500 he ought to take his loss coolly when he does not win?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to answer that question. These people went down to find vacant Government land that had lain there subject to entry at $2.50 an acre since 1878. These lands were vacant and open to entry for all of that time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] could have gone and entered them, as could any other citizen of the United States 21 years of age. And it is so plain a thing that a common-sense individual, any gentleman with one eye and a grain of sense——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is talking about himself.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I have two eyes, and some sense. I submit if there is any gentleman on the floor of this House that thinks these lands, which have lain there vacant, subject to be taken by any applicant, since 1878 until 1909 and 1910, were worth $8,000 per claim, he has not sufficient ability to represent any congressional district on the floor of this House.

Mr. MANN. Or in Oregon.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to repeat, further, what I said the other day, that when bills are referred to the regularly constituted committees of this House the facts are placed before those committees and thoroughly thrashed out. The committees make their reports to this House and they are entitled to decent consideration, and I wish to respectfully criticize the action of the gentleman from Illinois in setting up his wisdom against the wisdom of the committees of this House. I did not go to him, and I shall not go to him, and ask that this private bill, coming from Senator CHAMBERLAIN, be not objected to, nor shall I take my hat in my hand and go to his office and ask that another private bill that I introduced myself, that I am going to call up later, be not objected to. He is fooling only himself when he appropriates unto himself a superior wisdom to that of the Committee on the Public Lands or any other committee of this House. This question of the valuation which he is reading of these lands was thrashed out before the Committee on the Public Lands, and they pronounced the statement of this young forestry officer as being ridiculous and absurd. That is the statement the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is reading from. These lands to-day are not worth over $3,000 per claim, and some of them are not worth $2,000 per claim. He is giving the estimate there, and I want to state the facts here, and if gentlemen can contradict them hereafter at any time I will get up and make apology to this House and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN.]

Mr. MANN. I do not wish any apology from the gentleman.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The gentleman will not get it. I have no special desire to do so, because the gentleman does not deserve it.

Red fir is selling for 40 cents a thousand in that neighborhood now. That would make it worth about $400 a million, or $1,200 for three millions. It stands to reason that when these claims could be had for $420 each, and the additional cost for witnesses would bring the amount up to $600 or $700 and they were worth so much more, there would have been a grand rush for them if these people went to Washington and other States. If put to a vote, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] knows that the House in its wisdom will pass it, but he reserves the right to himself to object to every private bill that comes on this floor when a Member does not take his hat in his hand and go to him and ask him to refrain from making any objection.

Mr. MANN. That statement is not true, so that it is not worth answering.

Mr. Speaker, I am used to being abused by some man who has got a bill that is absolutely rotten. The gentleman stated that I read from a letter from one of the officials of the Forestry Service. I read from a statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, over the signature of the Secretary of Agriculture. The people involved in this case went from Oregon, a long ways off, down into California to get in on a good thing.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. A 10-to-1 shot.

Mr. MANN. Yes. It was a 10-to-1 shot, as the gentleman from New Jersey suggests. If they had won it would have been even better than a 10-to-1 shot, and because they did not win they cry and plead the baby act. I never did have any respect for a man who would gamble and smile when he won and plead the baby act when he lost. I object.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Public Lands, I think it is proper that I should state that the committee understood that this land was open for entry; that these 10 people entered upon it, and, through no fault whatever of theirs——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes; I object.

The SPEAKER. That ends it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I thought I was proceeding, not by unanimous consent, but through my committee right.

E. B. M'CLELLAND.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 700 (H. Rept. 1245).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is authorized to pay E. B. McClelland for services rendered as House Office Building policeman from May 1 to May 15, inclusive, 1911, $14.49.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNING, Mr. SIMS, Mr. SLOAN, and Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels that he should take these matters up in their order. There should be some order observed about it. The Chair will recognize first the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], and next the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

EVAN URNER RINEHART.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 7267, and that the bill be placed on its passage in the House. I move to substitute for the Senate bill the House bill—H. R. 25428—waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Evan Urner Rinehart.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by its title.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. This bill is not on the Private Calendar. What is the number of the House bill?

Mr. BROWNING. House bill 25428—No. 215 on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25428) waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Evan Urner Rinehart.

Mr. MANN. I have already objected to that bill twice. I will do it again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAHAM). Objection is heard. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized.

JOHN WILSON.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up some resolutions reported from the Committee on War Claims. They begin on page 36 of the calendar, the first being House resolution 598, a resolution (in lieu of H. R. 25636) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of John Wilson—No. 184 on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first of these resolutions is No. 153 on the Private Calendar—House resolution 580.

Mr. SIMS. I think I had better let that go over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the resolution indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The Clerk read as follows:

H. Res. 598. Resolution (in lieu of H. R. 25636) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of John Wilson.

Mr. MANN. What is the number of the resolution?

Mr. SIMS. The number of the resolution is House resolution 598. It is a resolution sending a bill to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 598.

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 25636) for the relief of John Wilson, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts and conclusions of law under section 151 of the act of March 3, 1911, "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary" (Public act No. 475, 61st Cong., 2d sess., p. 1138).

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the words "a finding of facts and conclusions of law" in lines 3 and 4, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "findings and conclusions."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 3 and 4, the words "a finding of facts and conclusions of law" and insert the words "findings and conclusions."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, if you will strike out the words "of facts" and the words "of law" you will have it.

Mr. MANN. Except that you would have it read "a finding" when it should be "findings."

Mr. SIMS. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

With the following amendment:

Line 4, strike out "a finding of facts and conclusions of law" and insert "findings and conclusions."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very natural resolution, I suppose, reported from the committee, to refer a bill to the Court of Claims. It was a bill over which the War Claims Committee did not have any jurisdiction, to begin with, and when I tell the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] what it is, he will be almost ready to fall dead in a faint.

Mr. SIMS. Then do not tell me.

Mr. MANN. For years and years the Army and Navy officers have been endeavoring to extract out of Congress back pay barred by the statute of limitations, based upon increased longevity pay on account of counting service in the Military and Naval Academies. They have had those claims come up in every possible way, reported from the Committee on Claims, added as Senate amendments, added as amendments to deficiency bills, added as amendments to claims bills, war claims bills, and in every possible way. This is the first time that I can remember they have worked the War Claims Committee, which has no jurisdiction over the subject, and slipped in a resolution, looking harmless on its face, that would apparently refer the matter to the Court of Claims in the hopes that under a recent law, if the Court of Claims would make a finding, they could then walk to the Auditor of the Treasury Department and take out between five and twenty millions of dollars of back pay, running back, some of it, 40 and 50 years.

Mr. SIMS. This resolution was reported by a subcommittee. I know nothing about it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is another resolution referring a bill having a claim for damages to real estate, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] is recognized.

LEWIS MONTGOMERY.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 16604, Private Calendar 222, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16604) for the relief of Lewis Montgomery.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized to cause a patent to be issued to Lewis Montgomery for the south half of the southeast quarter of section 18 and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 19, township 8 south, range 9 west, Willamette meridian, in Oregon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I understand the case it is in reference to whether a man has made requirements of the homestead entryman showing good faith in making an entry, and it would appear from the statement in the report from the First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury:

The evidence shows that the man selected a rough, steep, and mountainous tract, remote from civilization and railroad facilities, and inaccessible to horses and vehicles, the only way to reach it being on foot; that the land was covered with a dense growth of heavy timber, and was much more valuable for its timber than for any other purpose; that it would be exceedingly costly and difficult to clear the land for agricultural purposes.

The department held that he had not made the homestead entry in good faith, and it does not look to me as if he had. I would be very glad to have any information the gentleman from Oregon has.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Now, Mr. Speaker, as usual, or as he frequently does, the gentleman is presenting a half-baked theory of this case.

Mr. MANN. Well, make it that I always do. I am agreeable, for the sake of argument.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The gentleman has hurriedly referred to the papers on the call of this bill——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. I read the papers in the quiet of the night, without regard to the call of this calendar, and I expect I am as familiar with it as the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, to show that the gentleman is entirely mistaken, he says he understands this bill is to relieve the man who made a homestead entry upon lands that were remote, inaccessible, and principally valuable for timber, and so forth, and that he does not feel that that man ought to be relieved. Now, the facts are entirely different to what that statement would lead one to believe they are. It is true that James H. Dunn made such a homestead entry as the gentleman has shown by reading the report from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, but the point in this case is this: After James H. Dunn had made such a homestead entry as that, over 10 years ago, after he had gone to the land office and made his final proof and made his payments and received a final receipt, a number of conveyances were made upon the faith of that final certificate to that original entryman. He went to the president of a bank, Mr. Ralph Williams, and borrowed $1,800, and he went to another man at Dallas, Oreg., and borrowed $1,000 on this land that he had a final receipt for and was paying taxes on. He did not yet have his patent. He failed to make the payment of about $2,800, and there were foreclosure proceedings had in the circuit court of Lincoln County, and a sale was had. The holder of the second mortgage, in order to protect himself, bid the amount of the first mortgage and his own, and received a sheriff's deed. He made the sale in the ordinary course of business. Several conveyances were made. Finally, in 1908, Lewis Montgomery bought the land, eight years after the final proof, for $6,000.

There were no charges pending in the local land office against the legality of the original entry, and there was a law upon the statute books providing that if no contest or protest be made against the validity of a homestead entry prior to the submission of final proof, or within two years thereafter, the entry must be passed to patent.

Lewis Montgomery is a resident of Portland. There is not a better citizen in the United States than he. He bought this land, paying practically all it is worth, in 1908. As I say, there had been numerous conveyances prior to that. He is an innocent purchaser for full value of the original James H. Dunn claim. As I say, the law of the United States was plain, that if there was no contest or protest pending more than two years after the issuance of the receiver's final receipt that any purchaser would be absolutely protected. But what happened? In 1909, the year after this last conveyance was made and placed of record, the Commissioner of the General Land Office wrote a letter to the register and receiver of the Portland land office, saying that on a certain date back in 1901 James H. Dunn made a homestead entry; that thereafter, in 1907, James D. Watts, a special agent of the land office——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. If the Chair wants me to do so, I am perfectly willing.

The SPEAKER. The only interest the Chair has in it is to expedite matters. If the gentleman is going to object, he might as well object and be through with it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am going to object. The claim has absolutely no merit in it whatever.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The gentleman will not submit that question to the judgment of this House.

Mr. MANN. We will have a chance to submit it to the gentlemen of the House in regular order.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The bill has not been called in regular order during this session, and other private bills are in the same condition.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution No. 226. This is in the nature of an emergency resolution, and I would like to get it through.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that this matter does not fall under the unanimous-consent business; but it seems if it is going to be attended to it ought to be attended to now. The Chair thinks it fair to make that statement to the House. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 226) for the appointment of three members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Resolved, etc., That George H. Wood, of Ohio; John W. Farris, of Missouri; and Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, be, and they are hereby, appointed members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to succeed Oscar M. Gottshall, of Ohio; William Warner, of Missouri; and Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, whose terms of office will expire April 21, 1912.

With a committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, as I understand it this bill is reported with the unanimous recommendation of the committee, with a certain committee amendment changing a name?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I will ask to have the amendment reported, so that the Members will have information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, by striking out the words "Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey," and inserting the words "Patrick H. Coney, of Kansas."

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I must object to the present consideration of that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey objects. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. UNDERHILL].

FRED R. PAYNE.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 15241, Private Calendar 168.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized and empowered to place the name of Fred R. Payne, now on the retired list of the United States Navy as a lieutenant commander, on the retired list as a commander: Provided, That there shall be no back pay allowed by reason of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker, in order to give the gentleman a chance to explain the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the fact that there has been some objection to private acts of this character, but this bill was examined with great care by the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the report was considered by the full committee and the bill unanimously reported to this House in the belief that it covered an exceptional case. I think that anyone who will examine the report and will look into the matter will agree that while such acts might not be favored generally, yet this is one of very unusual character. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will not object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman why the report from the Secretary of the Navy on the bill is not incorporated in the report?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The report from the Navy Department was——

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize for its absence. It was a mistake. I have had the letter of the Secretary, addressed to the Committee on Naval Affairs, printed, and I have several copies in my hand which I intended to distribute among Members.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman if the Secretary of the Navy has recommended favorable action on this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. The Secretary of the Navy concluded his letter as follows:

It is recommended, therefore, that favorable consideration be not given to this measure.

Mr. MANN. I thought that was the reason.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the gentleman that that was not the reason, but that——

Mr. MANN. Then I will not say that.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad the gentleman will not say that, because it involves an implication, reflecting on the friends of the bill.

Mr MANN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself prepared the report, I know that that is not the reason.

Mr. BUTLER. I am obliged to the gentleman for his kind words.

Mr. MANN. However, regardless of that, so long as I am here I shall object to taking a man on the retired list—already under more favorable condition than any other class of citizens in our country—and promoting him in order to give him an increase of pay. They get more now than they would get in any other place in the world. When I am retired, if you will give me the pay of a lieutenant commander I shall not complain.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman has already said that it is his rule to object to such bills, and therefore, considering the fact that the session of Congress approaches its end and all Members are feeling weary, I do not think I shall ask time to make an explanation. The gentleman is able to get the facts from the report, and anything that I can say will not change his mind.

However, I would like to add this to what I have said: The facts in the case appealed to all of us on the Committee on Naval Affairs, and having considered the case fully, and having reasoned together, we concluded to report the bill, and the report was unanimously made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] is recognized.

PATRICK HOWE.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7434), and ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment thereto be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] moves to take from the Speaker's table the bill named by him, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 7434) for the relief of Patrick Howe.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendment was agreed to.

REIMBURSEMENT TO MEN OF BATTLESHIP "GEORGIA."

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 11986, reported from the Committee on Claims, be considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks that a bill of similar tenor from the House Committee lie on the table.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, that is not the situation.

The SPEAKER. Is this another bill?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman for another one.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. But just think how many bills Judge SIMS had. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Those were from another committee.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. This is a bill to reimburse the men of the United States battleship Georgia, one or two of whom live in my district, who suffered loss from the defalcation of the paymaster's clerk, E. V. Lee. The bill has been recommended for favorable passage by the Secretary of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is this bill on the Private Calendar?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Where is it?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. In the Committee on Claims, and I have been up there a million times to see about it.

The SPEAKER. If it is in the Committee on Claims, the gentleman can not call it up.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

CORBETT TUNNEL.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, in relation to the resolution (S. J. Res. 134) that I called up last night, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be taken up for consideration.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to object, but I want to reserve the right to object until my colleague [Mr. FERRIS] comes back. He has some objections to this bill, and in his absence I could not consent to have the resolution come up.

Mr. RAKER. This is the only time these poor people will have a chance to get recognition by this House.

The SPEAKER. There is an hour and thirty-five minutes yet.

Mr. DAVENPORT. If when my colleague [Mr. FERRIS] returns he is willing to withdraw his objection, I shall have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman from Oklahoma would find his colleague [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have been trying to find him. I have learned that he has returned from the Interior Department and gone toward his hotel.

The SPEAKER. This bill will go over without prejudice.

H. C. HODGES, H. A. POWELL, JOHN SMITH, AND JOSEPH RIDLEY.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20692) for the relief of H. C. Hodges, H. A. Powell, John Smith, and Joseph Ridley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States of America hereby forever relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest in and to the southwest quarter section 5 and the southwest quarter northwest quarter section 5, township 1, range 27, in Houston County (formerly Henry County), Ala., now held severally, in separate parcels and by independent titles, by H. C. Hodges, H. A. Powell, John Smith, and Joseph Ridley, under claim or color of title derived, directly in the case of said H. C. Hodges, and indirectly in the cases of the said H. A. Powell, John Smith, and Joseph Ridley from one F. H. Hodges, deceased; said lands having been the property of the said F. H. Hodges, deceased, and having been, on May 14, 1894, bought in by the United States under a fieri facias issued May 7, 1894, from the United States Circuit Court for the Middle District of Alabama for the sale of the said lands to satisfy a judgment rendered by said court on December 7, 1892, and made final on December 11, 1893, under scire facias issued on December 7, 1892, for $300 principal and $16.25 costs against one H. W. Harrell, principal, and the said F. H. Hodges, deceased, as surety, upon forfeited recognizance or bail bond.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is a committee amendment, and I ask that it be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to suggest to the gentleman, first, that the Committee on the Judiciary had no jurisdiction over this bill. Second, I can see no reason why the Government should release or quitclaim any interest it has until the people pay the judgment which the Government recovered, for which this land was sold.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that these are substantially the facts in this case: One Harrell was indicted for illicit distilling. Hodges became his surety on his bail or appearance bond. The defendant, Harrell, did not appear at the term of the court at which he should have appeared and a forfeiture was taken on the bond. After this forfeiture was taken, his surety on the bail bond saw that he was apprehended and brought to court.

Mr. MANN. Where is that shown in the report?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is shown toward the bottom of the report that—

He made default at the next term of the court, and under such default capias was issued on December 7, 1892, and the said Harrell was arrested and committed to jail.

Judgment was made final on the 11th day of May, 1893.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but it does not——

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman will permit me, of course, if I can not make my case strong enough to appeal to the gentleman's sense of justice, to say nothing of his usual urbanity and magnanimity, then my case is lost until next session of Congress.

The defendant was tried in the court and dealt with according to law. Mr. Hodges, who is now dead, was not a learned man. He was a plain, unlettered, but good countryman. He knew nothing about legal procedure or processes. He never knew anything of the issuance of this execution against his property. In fact, it did not appear that he knew that the judgment had been made final against him. After the judgment was made final the fieri facias was issued, and his land was sold. The land was sold some 15 years ago or more, and the marshal bid it in in the name of the United States. The amount of the costs was $53 and some cents, and the marshal executed a deed to the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States never asserted any title or claim to that land until 1911—last year. When the Department of Justice was having the district attorneys throughout the country clean up all old matters on their dockets and in their offices this was among the number. It appeared that while the deed had been made in this technical way, either in 1893 or 1894, to the Government of the United States, the Government had never asserted any claim to the land. These people had gone on continuing the occupation, use, and enjoyment of the land, and in the meantime some of the lands were bought by innocent third parties. In the meantime the principal, Hodges, is dead.

That is my case, and the amendment seeks to make the Government of the United States whole. It provides that the Government shall be paid $53 and some cents before this bill shall operate as a quitclaim.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the United States ought not to want to take the land of these people or take $300. All the Government wants in equity and justice is to be reimbursed for the cost which it has been put to, and the committee propose to do that by the amendment.

I recollect a similar case that was passed which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] had, and another similar case to this was passed on February 2, 1902, volume 35, United States Statutes at Large, page 1435. I may say that both of these other bills pertaining to this measure came from the Committee on the Judiciary, and for the reason, Mr. Speaker, that it dealt with the court matter, dealt with the judgment of the court, dealt with court proceedings, and in the former case it was held that the Committee on the Judiciary had jurisdiction.

That is my case, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is very plain that the Committee on the Judiciary did not have jurisdiction, because the Committee on the Judiciary does not have jurisdiction over any private claim of any kind. I will be very candid with the gentleman. I have been unable to find any information in the report as to how much it cost the Government to apprehend the criminal or the party under bond.

Mr. CLAYTON. I can state to the gentleman that $53 was the only cost.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CLAYTON. In the main prosecution that was the cost against the defendant.

Mr. MANN. Fifty-three dollars was the cost of the court and sale. How much it cost the Government to apprehend the person out on bail, there is no information. We have frequently—where a man went on a bond and the criminal escaped and the bondsman went ahead and expended his time and money in seeking to apprehend the criminal and was successful doing it—we have frequently released the bondsman, and in some cases paid him back the difference between the amount collected and the actual expense the Government has been put to. But here is a proposition to release a bond out of hand for any liability at all, and release the bond from any liability to the Government or any expense to the Government incurred in securing the principal, which I do not think ought to be done without any consideration in the House. This is a House bill; it is absolutely impossible for the Senate to pass it so as to become a law at this session of Congress. I think it had better go over until next session.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to make one or two more observations?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Replying to your last suggestion first, the next session will be a short session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Not as short as the balance of this session.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand that, of course; and therefore it will be very doubtful whether I can get consideration of this bill in the House at next session. That is the reason why I am anxious to have it considered at this time.

In reply to the other suggestion made by the gentleman, I may say that the man here or those who claim under Hodges, who are seeking relief, was not the man who engaged in the illicit distilling. He was in nowise a violator of the law himself; he was a law-abiding citizen and was merely surety for the violator. The violator was apprehended and dealt with in a criminal proceeding, and for the life of me, I do not see why the faults and offenses of a man who violated the law should be visited on a man who was merely his surety, if the surety makes the Government whole as far as he is concerned, and that the bill proposes to do. That is the whole of the case and I hope the gentleman will not object. I would like very much for this bill to go through at this session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama can do most anything with me, but this time, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL, Mr. UNDERHILL, and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania each asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and there was no objection.

ANNIVERSARY OF ADOPTION OF CONSTITUTION BY POLAND.

DEBT WORLD OWES TO BRAVE POLAND—CONGRESSMAN THAYER ADDRESSES NATIONAL POLISH ASSOCIATION.

[Special to The Post.]

WASHINGTON, May 5, 1911.

At a banquet commemorating the one hundred and twentieth anniversary of the adoption of a constitution by the people of Poland, given by the National Polish Association of the United States, at Washington, Wednesday night, the association was addressed by speakers of national prominence, and the story was retold in eloquent terms of how Sarmartia fell unwept without a crime.

The principal speakers of the evening were Congressmen THAYER, of Massachusetts, ASHER C. HINDS, of Maine, HENRY A. BARNHART, of Indiana, and PAUL HOWLAND, of Ohio.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me I desire to insert the following remarks delivered by me at a banquet commemorating the one hundred and twentieth anniversary of the adoption of a constitution by Poland, given by the National Polish Association of the United States:

"Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman and toastmaster, it is a great pleasure for me to be with you this evening and I wish to say in passing that the custom you have inaugurated of bringing your wives with you is one that could be copied with advantage by other bodies. Whenever I have brought home a menu card my wife has commented on the selfishness of the men and I am glad to see that our fellow citizens of Polish blood are more generous or under better marital control. Your learned confrère, who spoke both in Polish and English, has need of no excuses for his English. I envied his dexterity with my own mother tongue and wish that I had the mastery of the sesquipedalian vocabulary he possesses. Much that he said is very similar to what I have to say in a poorer way. Fortunately, you can see that I have my remarks written down so that you will acquit me of copying him.

"A little more than 100 years ago a written Constitution was adopted by two peoples separated by over 2,000 miles of land and the broad Atlantic, in which the hopes and aspirations for a stable form of government were embodied.

"Why did one barely last its promulgation, while the other is still a sacred fire on the altar to a hundred million of people? It was not a basic difference between the two but rather the difference in surroundings.

"One was the product of the people who had played a proud and controlling part in European history for over 1,000 years and the other the outcome of a struggle of but one and a half centuries with the wilderness. Yet the two are inextricably connected both in their inception and in their outcome.

"Of the American Constitution there is at this time to be said but little. There is no interference from outside interests as we are too far removed from European envy or control to be at all endangered. It worked out its own salvation and came to a position of power and independence.

"The circumstances surrounding the promulgation of the Polish constitution from the first were too powerful for its continuance.

"The broad and fertile fields of Poland were the object of the greed of Prussia, Austria, and Russia. While the very source of Poland's wealth presented no natural barriers against the aggrandizement of its neighbors, the principles of freedom and equality enunciated in its constitution were hateful to the despotisms of Europe who at once attacked it to its destruction.

"If it had been a little later it might have succeeded with the priceless aid of the French Republic, and the later history of Europe would have been materially changed, as the monarchies would probably have been ground to pieces between the upper and the lower millstones of popular liberty.

"But in spite of its unhappy fate the constitution of Poland has remained a living force throughout all these 12 decades. And if the hope of a free Poland in Europe seems to be evanescent, yet it has lighted the patriotic ardor of many a young Pole and made him turn with hopes of the fulfillment of their dreams of liberty to this Republic of the West, a Republic which clasps in its wide maternal embrace the hopes of all down-trodden people for pure and perfect liberty.

"And to the Poles especially we, the people of these United States, whether coming of Anglo-Saxon England, Celtic Ireland, or the Gothic or Latin races of Europe, we extend welcome, mindful not only of what their heroes, Pulaski and Koziosko did for us in the War of the American Revolution, but also for what that great Pole, John Sobieski, did September 12, 1683, when he stemmed the invasion of the Turks in their attack upon Vienna and saved Europe to Christianity and to the political development which has found its highest expression in this glorious country of ours."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the work of the Military Committee during the session of Congress which is about to close.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that while I do not agree with all that the Committee on Military Affairs has done, and all of the propositions that it has made, yet I think it is due to the gentleman from Virginia to say that the House has recognized his ability and his fairness, and his extremely arduous labors in connection with the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am myself very glad that he was made chairman of that committee. [Applause.] I have no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

GEORGE P. HEARD.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 23080) for the relief of George P. Heard, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow George P. Heard, late captain, Medical Corps, United States Army, to take the examination prescribed by law and under the regulations for the government of the Army for the grade of major in the Medical Corps: Provided, That if the said George P. Heard successfully passes the required examination the President is hereby authorized and directed to appoint him a major, Medical Corps, upon the active list of the Army, to rank from December 15, 1910: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to carry back pay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Everybody knows what I am going to do, perhaps including the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman to say that he objects?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there anything that I can say to the gentleman that will prevent his doing so?

Mr. SIMS. I suggest to the gentleman that he try it on and see.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the relief of George P. Heard. He was appointed a surgeon in the Army some years ago, first as a lieutenant, and then afterwards he stood an examination and was promoted to a captaincy, and when the time rolled around again for him to be again promoted he was requested to stand an examination. His record during all of the time that he was in the Army, as shown by the report here, was most excellent, both as a man and as a surgeon. When his examination papers were reported upon it was found that he lacked 1.8 per cent of making the required amount on the examination. Lacking that small amount, he was honorably retired from the service. For a short time in my life I was a school-teacher, and any of you gentlemen who have ever been school-teachers would know that the difference between 73.2 per cent and 75 per cent is a matter that is entirely within the discretion, so to speak, of the person who makes the marks. The same officer in the Army who marked Dr. Heard 73.2 per cent could not dispose of those papers a month afterwards and make the same mark to save his immortal soul, in my judgment. Under those circumstances, all that this bill asks is that the doctor may be allowed to stand another examination, and if he passes a proper examination, that he may be appointed a surgeon in the Army. If that is not a fair proposition, I do not know one. It seems to me it is one that the gentleman from Illinois should pass by and not object to, and I sincerely hope that he will not object to this. It has been recommended by the committee, and I hope that the bill may be passed.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Does not the gentleman recall the fact that in the Krebs case, which was somewhat similar to this, although the facts are even stronger in this case, the bill passed this House and has been approved by the President, and in his case it was 4 or 5 per cent below the proper mark, and he was put on the retired list with an increased rank.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will answer that by saying that in the Krebs case he was allowed to stand more than one examination

There was some question about his health, however, but he was allowed to stand several examinations and failed in those examinations. This is a much stronger case, because Dr. Heard was never allowed to stand more than one examination. The Krebs case was reported favorably by the committees in both the House and the Senate and was passed, and the President signed the bill, and I believe he has been retired. By the way, that was for retirement and not for service in the Army. This bill is to permit a man to again serve in the Army. That bill was to place a man upon the retired list. It does seem to me this bill has quite as much, or very much more, merit than that bill. I trust the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the danger of passing these bills at all is illustrated by what is now taking place. Because the House passed another bill, under entirely different conditions, the gentleman now insists that having passed that bill providing for a reexamination we must pass this bill for a reexamination.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I did not interrupt the gentleman, and I hope he will permit me to make a statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly; and then I will ask the gentleman to yield to me when he finishes.

Mr. MANN. This man is not in the service. He is out of it. He went out because he could not come up to the examination, and my distinguished friend from Tennessee says he might as easily be marked over 75 instead of a little under 75. The trouble is that the man who is marked less than 90 ought to be fired from the service. Of course, they have to make a line somewhere. The gentleman in his report states, and I think it is a very unjust statement to make, that the officer who examined Mr. Heard marked him by a small fraction below the grade that would pass him in order that he might not be passed. These marks are made by a number of different Army officers—surgeons—and to say that one of them deliberately made his mark to put a man out of the service does not do credit, in my opinion, either to the Army officers who conducted the examination or to the man they wanted to get out of the service. Now, there are thousands of men who would like to be examined for appointment in the Army in the Medical Corps, and when you can get it done you pass them all around. I am perfectly willing for the gentleman from Tennessee to take one and the gentlemen from other districts to take one, so that everybody has a chance to examine a surgeon in his district and name them for majors in the Army—a very good rank in the Army. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKELLAR. I notice the gentleman is correct about the reading of the report. It must have been inadvertent because there was no intention to improperly refer to any officer in the Army.

Mr. MANN. I thought that, and I thought it was a pretty serious reflection.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to correct it here and now. Of course, we did not intend that it should bear the interpretation the gentleman puts on it. However, I desire to say to the gentleman I do not take the position at all that this bill ought to pass because the Krebs bill passed. I think it ought to pass on its merits or it ought not to pass. I merely say this, that under the vigilant and careful scrutiny of the gentleman from Illinois a very much worse bill than this bill has passed this House.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not agree with the gentleman as to that. I think it was a very much better bill than this. Hence, I thought it was wiser not to pass any of these bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. If its language has anything to do with the objection of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. The language did not affect me at all, except it gave me a pain to have my friend from Tennessee use such a statement. I am glad he disavows the intention to have it read the way it apparently reads.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; that was a mistake, of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

LIEUT. SYDNEY SMITH.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consieration of the bill H. R. 25623.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25623) to authorize the transfer of Lieut. Sydney Smith from the retired to the active list of the Army.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object, or I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. WATKINS. I hope the gentleman will be kind enough to reserve his objection for a few moments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is most heartily and earnestly recommended by the Secretary of War. It is for the transfer of Lieut. Sydney Smith from the retired to the active list of the Army. In 1906, after gallant service of many years, Lieut. Smith received a partial sunstroke, or was exhausted from heat, in the line of duty in the Philippine Islands, and for some time after that his health was so impaired that he was not fit for active duty, but he was continued in the service until 1908. At that time it was deemed proper to retire him for the purpose of allowing him to recuperate from his affliction. This sunstroke or heat exhaustion caused him to have nervous prostration. It was not a great while after his retirement until his health became almost completely restored, and for nearly two years he has been in the most perfect health. His habits are good; his health is good. He is perfectly restored in every way to his former physical condition, and he is perfectly competent to discharge the active duties of an officer, and after a very careful and very extensive investigation the Secretary of War recommends that he be restored. In connection with this case the Secretary of War refers to the fact that a former United States Senator from Louisiana, Gov. Blanchard, certifies to his physical condition, his moral character, his standing as a business man, and to other people who consider he is worthy to be restored to the Army. The present lieutenant governor, the present mayor of Shreveport and his predecessor, the judge of the district court, and the most eminent citizens there all recommend that he should be restored to the active list of the Army. I can not possibly see how there can be any objection.

It will be an enormous saving to the Government to place him on the active list, because he is not only drawing the pay which he receives as a retired officer, but the officer who is serving in the place which he would fill and which he is so competent to fill is also receiving his pay. From every conceivable standpoint it is for the benefit of the service, and the Secretary of War recommending it, this is a commendable case. If the gentleman desires me to do so, I will read the entire report, which shows in flattering terms the service of this officer. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

JAMES E. C. COVEL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 25891) for the relief of James E. C. Covel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the bill read.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill, which is on the Speaker's table, and which is identical with this, be considered in place of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

An act (S 7378) for the relief of James E. C. Covel.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, James E. C. Covel, who was a second lieutenant of Company H, Sixteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably as a member of said company and regiment on the 14th day of April, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, has consent been given for the consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I do not object. I want to be heard on it a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is an illustration of a curious anomaly, if the statement of the War Department is correct. Here is a man who was in the Army and in the service and when in the service was dismissed, although he did not know it. He remained in the service, notwithstanding a dismissal which he knew nothing about for a long time—until his time was up, I think.

Mr. MONDELL. Did he receive pay during that time?

Mr. MANN. He must have received pay. And the facts are admitted. The War Department knows he remained in the service, and while an order was issued to dismiss him, he was not in fact, dismissed. Then they say that under the law, although he remained in the service, although they know he remained in the service and was not, in fact, dismissed, although an order was issued dismissing him, they can not correct the records to show the facts on the ground that the facts are as they appear in the War Department, regardless of what the facts were. That is in a letter from the Adjutant General.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman mean to say that the department contends it has not the power to correct its own record when it is in possession of the facts, knowing they are wrong?

Mr. MANN. Absolutely, that is what they say.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will allow me, this is the situation with respect to Lieut. Covel. He was serving in the West and was transferred to another department. He went there, or started to go there, and was intercepted on the way and was mustered into the service of another regiment.

Mr. MANN. He was serving on detached duty.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. And the War Department had no knowledge of the fact that he had been detached.

Mr. MANN. You do not mean the War Department. You mean the "head guy" here.

Mr. KAHN. The officials in the War Department did not know that he had been detached, and finally the officers of his first command, having had no knowledge of his whereabouts, having lost sight of him, reported him as being absent without leave and recommended his dismissal. He knew nothing about that, and he continued to serve, and the order of dismissal was actually made, but he continued with the regiment with which he was then serving.

Mr. CULLOP. Was he paid every 30 days?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. They knew where he was one day out of every 30 days, then?

Mr. MANN. They were in different departments.

Mr. KAHN. This all occurred during the Civil War at a time when there were a million men in the Army, and I dare say that in the great rush of business they did not scrutinize the lists as carefully as they would to-day, and they did not have the records in the department as carefully prepared as they have them to-day. Now, the War Department takes a position which is exactly as the gentleman from Illinois has stated it; that, as a matter of fact, they learned that Lieut. Covel was in the service subsequent to the order of dismissal, but having ordered him dismissed they held that they could not reinstate him.

Mr. MANN. That is not quite it. They held that they could not change the record showing that he was dismissed; although, in fact, he was still in the service. In other words, if the official record had shown that the man was dead, the production of him alive would not have been permitted to "falsify" the records showing that he was dead. It was an absurd position for the War Department to take.

Mr. MONDELL. Like the laws of the Medes and Persians, they claim that their records could not be changed or altered.

Mr. CULLOP. If the record was wrong and untruthful, it was not possible to make it speak the truth?

Mr. MANN. Yes. It was not possible to make it speak the truth. When you know the facts, the knowledge of the facts does not do any good.

Mr. CULLOP. That gives a good insight into the impractical way in which the War Department is operated.

Mr. MANN. It demonstrates the impracticability of some of the laws that Congress allows to remain on the statute books.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM BELL.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 16997) for the relief of William Bell, No. 220 on the Private Calendar, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws relating to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers William Bell, who was a private of Company G, Eighth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service as a member of said company and regiment on the 20th day of of March, 1862.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska to the phraseology of the bill, to what seems to be a verbal inaccuracy or redundancy in line 9 of the bill, where the word "of" was printed twice before the word "March."

Mr. SLOAN. The author does not insist on the duplication. I move to amend by striking out the first "of."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment to strike out the word "of" before the word "March." The Clerk will report the amendment.

Teh Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 9, by striking out the word "of" before the word "March."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SLOAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHRISTIAN H. HEDGES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEPPER] was to be recognized. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] also desires to be recognized.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that there is any objection to the bill of Mr. PEPPER'S, and I ask unanimous consent to have it reported.

Mr. MANN. What is the number of it?

Mr. FOSTER. I have forgotten the number of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman know what bill the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEPPER] desired to call up?

Mr. FOSTER. It is House bill 19191, for the relief of Christian H. Hedges, No. 257 on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to call up that bill after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] shall have been recognized.

PUBLIC BUILDING, RICHFORD, VT.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 6899, No. 372 on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it is not in order to call up anything except private bills at this time.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, if no one objects, it is in order to call up any bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Very well.

Mr. MANN. It is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK]?

Mr. GARRETT. Is it a public bill or a private bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not been able to ascertain what the bill is.

Mr. ASHBROOK. The bill was called up the other day and was passed over without prejudice. The gentleman who objected to it the other day is willing to withdraw his objection now. This bill was reported out of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANN. The order with reference to calling up bills on the Private Calendar expires at 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects?

Mr. MANN. There are gentlemen here who desire to use up the time with something else. I shall not object.

Reserving the right to object, I take it that no one else has any private bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). There are quite a number of other private bills that gentlemen have indicated their desire to have called up and considered.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not want to be in the attitude of objecting to the gentleman's bill, because I do not know anything about the merits of it; but has not the Chair been holding that recognition would not be given for calling up any public bill under this order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair so understands, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] asks unanimous consent. It is quite competent for anybody to object, and if objection is made the clerk will call another bill. Does the Chair hear an objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to be in the attitude of objecting to the bill, but I understand that the Speaker of the House has held positively and plainly that he would not recognize a Member to call up a public bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will be compelled to hold, then, that what has been suggested by several Members is tantamount to an objection to this bill, and will therefore recognize another gentleman. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEPPER].

CHRISTIAN H. HEDGES.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 19191) for the relief of Christian H. Hedges.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Christian H. Hedges, late captain Company G, Seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from military service of the United States as a member of said regiment on the 6th day of July, 1864.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following committee amendments were read and agreed to:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the initial letter "H."

Page 1, line 8, after the word "sixty-four," insert the following: "Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended to read: "A bill for the relief of Christian Hedges."

On motion of Mr. PEPPER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOSHUA H. HUTCHINSON.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 23515) for the relief of Joshua H. Hutchinson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue a patent to Joshua H. Hutchinson for the land embraced in his homestead entry, serial No. 02245, Susanville, Cal., for the east half of the southwest quarter and the west half of the southeast quarter of section 33, township 43 north, range 17 east, Mount Diablo meridian, upon submission of proof of residence upon and improvement and cultivation of said land as required by the homestead laws.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HEIR OF ANNA M. TORESON, DECEASED.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 22437) for the relief of A. W. Toreson, son and heir of Anna M. Toreson, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to public entry the following parcel of land situate in Modoc County, Susanville land district, in the State of California, to wit:

The south half of the southwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, section 9, township 41 north, range 10 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, in California, containing 160 acres.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, upon compliance with the foregoing section and proof of said compliance by the entryman under the timber-and-stone act of June 3, 1878, and acts amendatory thereof, to issue to A. W. Toreson, son and heir of Anna M. Toreson, deceased, a patent for the south half of the southwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, section 9, township 41 north, range 10 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, being the same land described in section 1 of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman very briefly whether the Government is under any legal liability in this case; whether the widow, Mrs. Toreson, had any legal claim to the property at the time of her death?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; she had filed——

Mr. MANN. That is not what I am asking. I am not going to take much time.

Mr. RAKER. From an investigation of the authorities I understand she had. I want to say to the gentleman this——

Mr. MANN. I will not stop to discuss it. If the gentleman will answer two or three questions, I will not object.

Mr. RAKER. I will try to.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say whether the lady had any legal claim to the property?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If she had any legal claim to the property, how can we convey it to one of her heirs to the exclusion of the others?

Mr. RAKER. There may be a question about that, and I will ask to amend the bill by striking out the words "A. W. Toreson, son and" and to substitute "the" and make the word "heir" plural—"heirs"—and amend the title accordingly.

Mr. MANN. So that it would read how?

Mr. RAKER. So that it will read, "issue to the heirs," and then amend the title so that it will read, "for the relief of the heirs."

Mr. MANN. Then I have no objection to it. I do not want to involve the Government in any liability.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the word "said," and in the same line strike out the word "entryman" and insert in lieu thereof the words "entry woman or her heirs."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, on page 2, line 6, the words "A. W. Toreson, son and heir," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the heirs."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 6, strike out the words "A. W. Toreson, son and heir" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the heirs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amended bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CORBETT TUNNEL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from California about the bill that was partly considered yesterday, in which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] was interested?

Mr. RAKER. There is some discussion going on about that bill, Mr. Speaker, and I think it will be arranged so that it can be taken up after 2 o'clock without objection. It is not on this calendar, and under the ruling of the Speaker, I do not want to trespass.

The SPEAKER. How is it going to be arranged?

Mr. RAKER. After 2 o'clock we can take it up by unanimous consent.

UNITED STATES CORPORATION COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in introducing this bill (H. R. 26415) creating a United States corporation commission and providing for Federal incorporation, it may be introduced by myself, by Mr. YOUNG of Michigan, by Mr. DANFORTH, of New York, and by Mr. STERLING, of Illinois, if he so desires.

I will say that formerly it was often the custom to introduce bills coming from a large number of Members together, but in the end of the Sixtieth Congress, 27 gentlemen, of whom I was one, introduced a resolution changing the Rules of the House, and at that time there was appointed a committee of which Mr. FITZGERALD, of New York, was chairman, and that committee reported that whereas this practice of introducing bills with more than one Member's name on it had occurred about 10 times in the Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth Congresses, nevertheless, in their opinion, the true meaning of the rule would prohibit more than one Member's name being on the bill.

Now, in this particular case we want in some way to show that this bill is the joint work of the Members introducing it, representing the minority views of the Stanley steel committee, and we know of no other way to do that except by introducing it jointly. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that I may do so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that the same situation would arise where a majority or a minority member of a committee desired to have a bill introduced which they had all agreed to. I think it is a reprehensible practice. At one time it threatened to attain such proportions that a bill would be introduced by the majority, and if a man did not put his name down for the introduction of the bill he was held to object to the passing of the bill. I am opposed to the practice.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I remember the only case to which the gentleman can refer, where there were 27 signatures to change the rules. That was the occasion of the report of the committee to which I never agreed as a parliamentary proposition. I ask that the gentleman will not interpose an objection at this time. I think it is properly safeguarded.

Mr. MANN. I dislike to interpose an objection, but I only know one way in matters of this sort, and that is to treat everybody alike.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will call to the gentleman's attention the result that is inevitably going to ensue, and that is that three gentlemen at least will introduce exactly the same bill.

Mr. MANN. That may be unfortunate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois his opinion upon the matter. What objection is there to more than one man signing his name to a bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is the proposition: Supposing I have a bill that I want to have considered and pressed in the House. I go to every Member of the House and say, "Will you put your name on as an introducer to this bill? If you do you go on record for it, and if you do not you are to be regarded as an enemy to the measure." That method of coercion will never be adopted in the House as long as I can prevent it. It is a dangerous method of coercion.

The SPEAKER. Of course the Chair does not want to argue the matter with the gentleman. He asked his opinion and ought to abide by it, possibly.

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the Chair to do that.

The SPEAKER. The process of getting signers to a petition or a bill is one of the easiest things known among men, and the Chair does not believe that the average Member would really consider that he was under any obligations whatever to support the bill, even though he puts his name to it. The Chair desires to arrive at some reasonable and rational conclusion, and that is the reason he asked the gentleman from Illinois, who has had very large experience, and who has been exceedingly active.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the rule under the special committee was adopted as a practice in the House that not more than one Member could introduce a bill. While that rule has been broken several times during this Congress, nothing has been said about it, because it has not gone to any extent, although at one time somebody threatened to bring it up in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] was kind enough to hand to the Speaker the report of a special committee on the right of Members to present bills or resolutions with the name of more than one Member attached thereto, to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1909, on pages 3808 and 3809. That report is signed by JOHN J. FITZGERALD, MARLIN E. OLMSTED, FRANK D. CURRIER, CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, and SWAGAR SHERLEY. It is a long report, and the Chair will not read it all, but will read certain sections of it:

A casual examination of Rule XXII does not disclose any inhibition against the attachment of more than a single name to a bill or resolution. Examined in the light of the evolution of the rules and practice relating to the presentation of bills, however, and bearing in mind the purpose sought to be accomplished by the changes made from time to time, resulting finally in the introduction of all bills without the formality of recognition, it seems clear to the committee that the underlying principle of individual recognition still prevails and that the presentation of a bill involves such recognition.

A careful search has been made to ascertain whether the question referred to the committee had ever been raised and determined. No record of such a decision has been found.

The committee has had called to its attention the action of Mr. Thomas B. Reed, when Speaker, in a matter involving the same question to be determined by this committee.

Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, informed the committee that he had received a memorial from the Legislature of Mississippi while Mr. Reed was Speaker. There were attached to the memorial the names of all of the Representatives from that State, and Mr. WILLIAMS placed it in the basket at the Clerk's desk. In the RECORD the day following the memorial was reported as having been presented by Mr. WILLIAMS alone. Upon inquiry he was informed that the Speaker, Mr. Reed, had stricken all other names from the memorial, and he later informed Mr. WILLIAMS that he had done so since, under the rules, it was impossible for more than one Member to present a memorial.

Had this decision been made in such manner as to have been preserved in the records of the House it would undoubtedly have been regarded as controlling forever.

The committee winds up by indorsing the suggestion of Mr. Speaker Reed. It is unnecessary for the Chair to state his opinion of Speaker Reed. The Chair does not believe that any man who was ever in Congress or in the Speaker's chair used the English language more luminously or more aptly than he did. Whenever he ruled upon a point—which he practically did in this matter by his action, if not by his word—the present Speaker will be exceedingly slow to overrule him. The Chair therefore thinks that not more than one name ought to be on a bill or resolution.

MAJ. GEORGE A. ARMES.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11397) authorizing the appointment of Maj. George A. Armes, United States Army, retired, to the rank and grade of major general on the retired list of the Army, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint George A. Armes, now a major on the retired list of the United States Army, to the position of major general on the retired list of the United States Army, with the rank and pay of the advanced grade, and to commission him accordingly.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws conflicting with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint George A. Armes, now a major on the retired list, a brigadier general in the United States Army and place him upon the retired list with the rank of brigadier general, and with the same pay he is now receiving, namely, that of a major on the retired list, to take rank from the date of the approval of this act, the retired list being increased for that purpose only."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask my distinguished friend from West Virginia at what grade was Maj. Armes retired from the Army in the first instance?

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. The report in this case was prepared by Mr. HUGHES of Georgia.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say he was retired at the grade of captain.

Mr. HAY. And it is desired he be promoted to the grade of major on the retired list.

Mr. MANN. He was retired at the grade of captain and now seeks to be promoted to be major on the retired list. If the gentleman desires to make some remarks I will withhold the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the right to object.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. I simply desire to state, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this bill, that I am doing this for the benefit of Mr. HUGHES of Georgia, who is sick and confined to his room. He has made a report here in which he says that Maj. Armes was a very brave soldier, and I think perhaps the Members of this House will bear me out in the statement that he must have been a very diligent one also. Certainly if the objection is to be made it is not necessary to discuss the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are certain gentlemen who wish to be heard when this is up in the House, and of course there is not time enough between now and 2 o'clock to afford that consideration, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ISAAC THOMPSON.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill H. R. 3957, Calendar No. 222.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Isaac Thompson, now a resident of Columbus, Franklin County, Ohio, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company F, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, on the 26th day of February, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear a statement of this case.

Mr. HAY. I will state, Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, and I called it up for him. The Clerk can read the report.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman familiar with the facts of the case? I assume that he is, as it comes from his committee.

Mr. HAY. I am to a certain extent, but it was reported to the full committee by a subcommittee, and I am not sufficiently familiar to give the gentleman all the details about this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. This was reported from the full committee unanimously, was it?

Mr HAY. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. If the gentleman will permit, I have reported several of these, and I think I am familiar with them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PEPPER. I think the gentleman will have no objection to this bill. It is shown by the records that this soldier did serve from September 5, 1861, to February 26, 1865.

Mr. MONDELL. February 26, 1865; and then he was reported as being absent.

Mr. PEPPER. He was reported as being absent without leave and subsequently was marked a deserter.

Mr. MANN. Is this the man who was in three different regiments?

Mr. PEPPER. He states the reason he left the regiment was that he and a number of others proposed to go home and stay a few days and then return. He was on leave, and he left without any intention of staying away, but he got home and he went to Indiana on a visit, and he did not get back as soon as he intended, and he was afraid he would be taken as a deserter. This is the statement he made in his application, and there are several affidavits from other men corroborating the circumstances under which he served. I remember in this case the committee thought it would not undertake to excuse or explain away his absence, but take into consideration his long and faithful service and consider it under those circumstances.

Mr. MONDELL. In view of the long service of the soldier and the fact that he was marked a deserter practically after the war had concluded, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES S. KINCAID.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 26078.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26078) for the relief of Charles S. Kincaid.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Charles S. Kincaid, late of Company A, Thirty-seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry; Company B, One hundred and ninety-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; and captain Company B, Third Regiment Arkansas Volunteer Infantry, African descent, subsequently known as the Fifty-sixth Regiment United States Colored Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said Third Regiment Arkansas Volunteer Infantry on the 2d day of August, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PEPPER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLAIMS OF SETTLERS IN SHERMAN COUNTY, OREG.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 295.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

An act (S. 295) to adjust the claims of certain settlers in Sherman County, Oreg.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, my recollection is that that is a long bill, and it is now nearly 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is but little over a page, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have a two or three hour speech on the bill which I think I will deliver when it comes up, and I think the speech will be worth listening to, and I can not say that of all the speeches which I deliver.

Mr. HAWLEY. We have all the summer before us, I will say to the gentleman.

This is a very meritorious measure and ought to pass, so that the relief provided in the bill may be given these former settlers who made entry on the lands in good faith and suffered loss through no fault of their own.

This bill provides for the appropriation of certain sums of money to certain settlers named in a report by Special Agent Thomas B. Neuhausen, of the Department of the Interior, which report was transmitted to Congress December 6, 1904, by Secretary of the Interior E. A. Hitchcock and published as House Document No. 36, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session.

Concerning this report a former Secretary of the Interior says that the investigation conducted by Special Agent Neuhausen was exhaustive; that the department accepts the facts as developed in the investigation; and that the facts so ascertained may be safely made the basis for such further relief as Congress deems proper to extend.

The claims of these settlers are based upon the erroneous action of the Secretary of the Interior, as set forth at length in the report above mentioned. The basis of their claims is essentially the same as that of what were known as the Des Moines River settlers, for whose relief an appropriation was made by Congress in the act of August 18, 1894 (28 Stat., 396).

Believing that the precedent established in the case of the Des Moines River settlers is in accordance with justice and equity, similar relief should be extended to the Sherman County, Oreg., settlers.

The lands in Sherman County, referred to in the bill, lie within the overlapping limits of the grants by the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat., 365), to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railway, and the act of February 25, 1867 (14 Stat., 409), to aid in the construction of The Dalles Military Road. The line of the Northern Pacific road opposite these lands was not constructed, and the grant to the extent of the unconstructed road was declared forfeited by the act of September 29, 1890 (26 Stat., 496).

The Department of the Interior, in carrying this forfeiture act into effect, held that the Northern Pacific grant, being prior in time, defeated the grant for The Dalles Military Road, and restored the lands within the overlap to entry. A large number of entries were made of the lands thus restored, and in some cases patents were issued thereon.

Subsequently the Supreme Court, in the cases of Wilcox v. Eastern Oregon Land Co. (176 U. S., 51) and Messenger v. Eastern Oregon Land Co. (ibid., 58), rendered decisions in favor of the company. Following these decisions, a number of the erroneously allowed unpatented entries were canceled.

The question as to relief for the settlers who were misled by the action of the department in restoring the lands to entry has heretofore been considered by Congress, and the Senate Committee on Public Lands has made two reports thereon, published in Senate Document No. 8, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, and Senate Document No. 240, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.

On April 19, 1904 (33 Stat., 184), Congress passed an act for the relief of these settlers by giving them credit when making homes and entries upon other lands for the period of their bona fide residence upon and the amount of their improvements made on the lands for which they were unable to complete title. Few, if any, of the settlers took advantage of this act.

By act of February 26, 1904 (33 Stat., 51), Congress directed an investigation of the claims of the settlers referred to, and on June 3 following, a special agent was detailed to make the investigation in the field, and the local land officers at The Dalles, Oreg., were instructed to publish a notice advising all claimants that they might supplement the investigation in the field by a showing before their office, if they so desired. In addition, the local officers were instructed to give special notice by registered mail to all known claimants.

The Neuhausen report states the facts at length and, I believe, shows conclusively that the relief asked for should be granted. These claims have been pending before Congress for many years, and I earnestly urge that the House take the matter up and consider the cases on their merits.

Mr. MANN. I will prepare the speech during the summer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. If any other gentleman has a bill on the Private Calendar which he wishes to call up he can do so now.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, how about the bills on the other calendar?

The SPEAKER. This is for bills on the Private Calendar.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MEN ON U. S. S. "ALABAMA."

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, unless there is something else before the House, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11986. It is simply a bill, Mr. Speaker, appropriating $4,200 to the men of the U. S. S. Alabama who suffered loss through the defalcation of the paymaster's clerk, one E. V. Lee.

The SPEAKER. Is this bill on the Private Calendar?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I was over to the Committee on Claims. I do not want to criticize them. I was there once, anyway, and they kind of forgot it. It was not my fault.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair is trying to ascertain is where this bill is in a parliamentary sense.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Is it in print, or only in the gentleman's mind? [Laughter.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I wish my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would really go down and have his lunch so that we could go ahead and do some business here. [Laughter.] I want to say to him that the bill has been printed and has been before the Committee on Claims, and the bill has been before a subcommittee of that committee, and I was before the subcommittee until I had the chairman's doormat worn out. I furnished him a new one and christened that, and then, Mr. Speaker, he said he would refer the bill to the general committee, but some of the gentlemen on that committee had bills that meant more to them in their districts than this did to me in mine.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if my genial, handsome friend from New Jersey, with his dulcet tones and smiling face, was unable to get a favorable report from the Committee on Claims, certainly he has not any such merit in the claim that would justify bringing it in here.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I wanted my distinguished, and not altogether uncomely, friend from Illinois to say.

Mr. MANN. I am not in the same class with my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I agree to that readily. I want to say to my friend from Illinois, Mr. Speaker, that the bill was reported favorably by the subcommittee in charge of the bill, of which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MAGUIRE] is the distinguished and efficient chairman. And the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom this bill was referred, reported favorably to that committee, and asked that the money be refunded to these boys. Now, there are two of them living in my district, and I think there is one living in the district of the gentleman from Illinois, and I know there is one living in the district of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]——

Mr. FOSTER. There is not any in my district.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. And there is one in the gentleman's district, possibly.

Mr. MANN. They have been very negligent if there are any living in my district. They have not communicated to me, and therefore I shall have to object.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I want to know if there is any parliamentary way in which this bill can be brought before the House at this time?

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest the gentleman get a rule.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I know the rules, but not how to avoid them.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman the way to get his bill before the House would be to send a letter over to the Senate and get the claim put on the deficiency bill. I understand they never object to putting any claim on the deficiency bill. Thereby he will get it before the House.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, may I ask for a vote? I understand there is no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then I will shorten the time. I object.

THEODORE N. GATES.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 3769, Private Calendar No. 258, in behalf of Mr. O'SHAUNESSY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Theodore N. Gates shall be held and considered to have served as a private of Company K, Twenty-fifth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, from December 31, 1862, up to September 29, 1863, and was honorably discharged as of the last above-mentioned date: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in the administration of the pension laws Theodore N. Gates, late of Company K, Twenty-fifth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 29th day of September, 1863: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have another amendment.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman an amendment in addition to the substitute?

Mr. CURLEY. It is just to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. That comes afterwards. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended by the substitute.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for about two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEPPER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, to extend my remarks immediately.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERRIS. How long is the RECORD issued after the close of a session of Congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the RECORD is issued a month or so after the adjournment.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

MAJ. BEECHER B. RAY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, informs me that that committee has put in the basket to-day a report (H. Rept. 1253, pt. 2) on the subject of Maj. Ray. The minority members of the committee are absent. I ask unanimous consent that any member of the minority may have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject or to file the minority views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the minority members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department shall have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. For how long a time does the gentleman desire them to have that privilege?

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask that they might file their minority views by handing their views to the Clerk after the adjournment of Congress and have them printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman adds to his request that the minority views may be handed to the Clerk and printed after Congress adjourns, as though it had not adjourned.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to join the gentleman from Illinois in hoping that this consent may be given.

Mr. MANN. It is fair to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to say that with that courtesy which he always extends he himself suggested to me that in fairness to the minority I should make the request I have made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FELIX MORGAN.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in the last two minutes devoted to the consideration of private bills, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 21849, No. 230 on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Felix Morgan, of Wirt County, W. Va., out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, to compensate him for injuries received while in the employ of the Government on the Little Kanawha River, in Wirt County, W. Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would just like to make this brief observation. The case referred to here is undoubtedly a pitiable case. The accident occurred in 1891, 21 years ago. Only two or three years ago did we adopt the policy of the Government paying any compensation at all in case of a personal injury. As far as I am concerned, I am unwilling to give unanimous consent to go back 21 years to take up these personal-injury claims. If we go back 21 years, we might equally go back 31 years or 41 years or 51 years. I do not think we ought to start the practice of considering claims which would be barred by the statute of limitations, if they were against a private individual, and I feel constrained to object.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the objection.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. As the gentleman from Illinois says, this is a very pitiful case. One of the engineers of the War Department says that if any case needs redress this is the one. I can not appeal to the good looks of the gentleman from Illinois, as my other friend did, but I can appeal to a better part of him——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had the judgment to say that he did not appeal to my good looks, because that would not carry any weight.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. The gentleman from Illinois has a great big heart in him, as I have often found during my short career in this House, and I feel under obligations to him in many other matters. I can only appeal to the great heart of the man who says that this is a pitiful case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

REMARKS OF MR. CLARK OF MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The time for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes, or so much thereof as I desire to use. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Chicago Republican national convention of 1880 was one of the greatest in the history of the Republic. The "Stalwart" cohorts, marshaled by Roscoe Conkling, a prince among men, went into the fight shouting for "The Old Commander." The "Featherheads," led by Gen. Garfield, soldier, statesman, scholar, orator, had for their war cry, "Anything to beat Grant!" It was a veritable battle of the giants. The most dramatic feature of that historic conclave was Conkling's spectacular speech nominating Grant. The most striking sentence in that magnificent oration was this: "Gen. Grant's fame was earned not alone by things written and said, but by the arduous greatness of things done."

My Democratic brethren, that sentence uttered by the masterful and brilliant New Yorker fits our case like a glove. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In his old age Frederick the Great had a new mausoleum built for the royal family. When the bodies were removed to their last splendid resting place, the great King had the coffin of his most illustrious ancestor, the Great Elector, opened. Patting the hand of that mighty warrior and statesman, Frederick said—and said most truly: "This one did great things."

When the future historian comes to review the times in which we live, he will declare with absolute truth that the House Democrats of the Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congresses did great things. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

By so doing we have made a sweeping Democratic victory not only possible, but of such high probability as to approximate certainty; a victory which will give us the House, the Senate, and the President, thereby enabling us to work out our destiny with a free hand, accepting both the blame and the praise for what we do and what we do not do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The other day the minority leader [Mr. MANN] regretted the fact that we do not have a responsible government as they have in Great Britain. All sensible men who have given thought to the subject join in his regret. The nearest approach we can have to a responsible government is to have House, Senate, and President all of the same political faith, which I hope will be the case after March 4, 1913, and it goes without saying that I hope they will all be of the Democratic faith. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Every man who had a share in the great work accomplished is entitled to his quantum meruit of the honor. As Admiral Schley said, touching the splendid naval victory off Santiago: "There is glory enough for all." We found the party all shot to pieces and inured to the habit of defeat. Behold it to-day, united, defiant, aggressive, militant, full of hope! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have won many victories, but what is far better, we have formed the habit of victory. No such sudden and wondrous transformation was ever wrought in a parliamentary body in the history of the world. When I remember the happy status of our Republican friends March 4, 1909, and think of their present woeful plight, I recall the splendid lines of Byron in his "Destruction of Sennacherib":

> Like leaves of the forest when summer is green,
> That host with their banners at sunset were seen;
> Like leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown
> That host on the morrow lay withered and strown.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the general situation in both parties we have a right to felicitate ourselves and the country, for I believe with all my heart that it is for the best interests of our country and our free institutions, which we all adore, that Democrats should sit in the seats of the mighty; should hold every coign of vantage; should occupy every place of power.

The secret of our marvelous success is simple—unity of thought, unity of purpose, unity of action, frequent counsel together, a spirit of mutual conciliation, strict adherence to principle with utmost latitude in nonessentials, subordination of individual desire to the general party good, sacrifice of personal ambitions, in the earnest, honest, and patriotic endeavor to serve the people and the whole people with whatever of capacity God has blessed us.

Montgomery's fine line exactly describes the Democrats of the House in the Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congresses:

> Distinct as the billows; one as the sea.

All we have to do is for Democrats throughout the land to follow our excellent example and we will be conquerors in a contest so stupendous that Sir Edward Creasy might well add it to his "Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World."

While I have said that every Democrat is entitled to his full share of the glory—and I do it gladly—I will add that no majority was ever more successfully led than has been the majority in this House under the leadership of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. [Applause.] I would be neither fair nor just if I did not also state that no minority was ever led more ably than has been the Republican minority in this House under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.] Leader MANN has contested with Leader UNDERWOOD every step of the long and wearisome road which we have traveled with the stubborn courage of the English squares at Waterloo. I have not always agreed with Brother MANN—God forbid!—but it is simple truth to say that he lives up fully to his name. He is in very truth a man. Were it not for him I would feel decidedly lonesome in the Speaker's chair. [Laughter and applause.]

I am intensely proud of the ability of the membership of the House on both sides of the big aisle, and as your Speaker, the dean of the faculty, so to speak, I have a right, and it affords me genuine pleasure, to say so. Pessimists have the bad and incorrigible habit of forever looking back to the Golden Age, but I prefer to believe with St. Simon: "The Golden Age is not behind, but before us." This House will not rank highest in oratory, but in the "arduous greatness of things done" it has had few peers and no superiors. With our educational facilities constantly growing better, the average capacity of public men should increase as the years steal into the centuries.

I utterly refuse to believe that the country is in any sort of danger of going to the dogs, because I have implicit faith in the courage, patriotism, and ultimate good sense of the American people. Government is an experimental, not an exact, science, and we should, and no doubt will, gradually approximate the perfect standard.

Since March 4, 1897, until this Congress convened, all that Democrats, being only a weak minority, could do was to promise what they would do if they got a chance to run the legislative machine. In 1910 the voters of the land commissioned us to control the House, which is one-third of the legislative machine. Now, as this Congress has lived three-fourths of its life, we say to the American people with honest pride: "There stands our record of things accomplished, so far as the House is concerned. It speaks for itself." Of course, we have not done all that we desired to do, because we were confronted with a Republican Senate and a Republican President.

For years we were sneered at as a party of mere negation, but this Democratic House has passed more bills in the nature of constructive statesmanship than did any other House in a generation, notwithstanding the fact that only six Democratic Members of this House had ever served in a majority before. We were green hands in formulating and conducting the public business, but the Democratic Members, including the new recruits, have performed and fought and won like veterans.

For years we were ridiculed as a mob, a rabble, without coherence or discipline, as militia fighting regulars, but we this day constitute as thoroughly a disciplined force as ever appeared in the House of Representatives or any other parliamentary body since parliamentary bodies were instituted among men.

It was freely, gleefully, and maliciously predicted when we carried the House that we would never be able to muster our full strength on any important proposition. Even the exact dates on which we would dissolve into warring factions and go to pieces were set down in cold type. But the record shows that we not only mustered our full strength on every important proposition but more than our full strength by reenforcements from the Republicans. To such an extent have we done this that at last we passed two great tariff bills over the President's veto, the first instance of the kind in the history of the Republic. [Applause.] Our thanks and the gratitude of the country are due to the brave, wise, and patriotic Republicans who have cooperated with us in passing good bills.

Toward the close of his long and heroic career St. Paul proudly boasted: "I have fought a good fight; I have kept the faith." The Democrats in this House could adopt the language of the great apostle without exaggeration or bad taste. [Applause.]

What is it that has produced the astounding change in the political situation since that melancholy day in November, 1908, when we were so completely flattened out? It is a simple and instructive story which public men who would escape the people's wrath should take to heart so long as the earth spins upon its axis or slides down the ecliptic.

In brief, it is this: The Republicans, in order to get in, promised to revise the tariff down; but, being in, they proceeded to revise it up. For this act of bad faith they were severely punished in 1910 and will be more severely punished in 1912. [Applause.]

The people deserve to be treated honestly, fairly, candidly, and courageously. Platforms should contain those propositions, and those propositions only, which the framers thereof intend to enact into law if they ever get a chance. Promises made to win an election should be religiously carried out after election. Men should say what they mean and mean what they say. The voters of the land are entitled to that square deal of which we hear so much and see so little.

The Republicans failed to keep their promises and came to grief, as they deserved to do. The Democrats came in on six principal promises and have redeemed them every one. The six principal promises were:

To pass a bill compelling publication of campaign contributions and disbursements before the election; to pass a resolution submitting a constitutional amendment for election of United States Senators by popular vote; to economize; to liberalize the rules; to admit Arizona and New Mexico as two States; to revise the tariff down—all of which has been done.

We passed tariff bills which would have saved the American people $5 per capita, or $27.50 to the family, but the President would not permit them to become laws, and the people still groan under an outrageous load of tariff taxes. Our tariff bills, while reducing the amount of money which the present tariff bill costs the people by $5 per capita, would have raised ample revenue to run the Government, for it should never be forgotten that of every $5 taken from the people by the Payne tariff law only $1 goes into Uncle Sam's pockets, while $4 go into the pockets of the tariff barons. Our tariff bills would have gone far toward reducing the high cost of living so oppressive to the masses, but the President would not have it so—more's the pity.

In addition to this, we have passed more bills for the benefit of labor than any Congress that ever sat. We have passed bills liberalizing the homestead law, making it so easy for American citizens to obtain homes in their own country that they will not feel disposed to expatriate themselves into the British Northwest. [Applause.] We passed a bill rendering the condition of our seamen better and life at sea more tolerable. We passed the Panama Canal bill, which is one of the most important pieces of legislation ever placed upon the statute books. We passed the excise bill, which is in its nature an income-tax bill, by which we transferred a large burden of taxation from the backs of the poor, who are least able to bear taxation, to the backs of those who are more able to pay taxes, a most righteous performance. We passed sundry other bills of a reformatory and beneficent character, for which we will receive the support and plaudits of the American people. [Applause.]

"By their fruits ye shall know them," is a rule established by highest authority for measuring human conduct. It is a just rule, a fair rule, and by it we will gladly be judged.

What the Democratic House accomplished, so far as it could, for the amelioration of conditions, thwarted as it has been by a Republican President and a Republican Senate, is only an earnest of what we will do when we come into full possession of the three legislative branches of the Government.

True, President Taft vetoed most of our bills of a remedial character. That was his prerogative, unwisely exercised. He made his record; we made ours. On these records we appeal to the country with absolute confidence that when the polls close in November we will have elected a Democratic House, a Democratic Senate, and Gov. Woodrow Wilson to the Presidency and Gov. Thomas R. Marshall to the Vice Presidency—consummations devoutly to be wished, not only consummations devoutly to be wished, but which, as we believe and hope, will prove of inestimable and enduring benefit to the entire American people, of whatever persuasion—religious or political. [Prolonged applause.]

FEDERAL CONTROL OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes, more or less, in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, Col. Roosevelt has characterized the legislation proposed by the Stanley committee as more foolish and futile than the efforts of the Taft administration to effectively enforce the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act. This is indeed a severe arraignment. If it be true that the bills indorsed unanimously by this committee will, when enacted into law, prove of no greater service to the country than the antitrust activities of the present administration, then, indeed, will it be true that the money expended was misappropriated and the long months of time devoted to this strenuous task worse than wasted.

I am not inclined to doubt Col. Roosevelt's sincerity in this statement. The program outlined by the committee must to him seem absurd and ridiculous. The inspired Gospel was—

> To the Greeks foolishness
> And to the Jews a stumblingblock.

This emperor in embryo is not expected to indorse legislation providing for the drastic control and thorough regulation of great monopolies doing an interstate business without in any way increasing the authority of a self-constituted autocrat or providing for a scientific system for the espionage and blackmail of malefactors of great wealth by a select coterie of political spies organized into a bureau operating behind closed doors and whose star-chamber proceedings are known only to the President whose reelection is secured by their successful exploitation. [Applause.]

The late revelations of the relations between Col. Roosevelt and the Standard Oil Co. should surprise nobody. "A practical politician" who knew how to approach "my dear Harriman" and how to receive Frick and Gary in time of stress would surely not overlook so rich a find as John D. Archbold, who for years has made it his business to keep in touch with the Aldriches, the Forakers, the Roosevelts, and other facile and approachable politicians of the same stripe.

The worst part of it is not that Mr. Roosevelt shared the plunder of this lawless monopoly. The money was collected and spent; that is ancient history. The astounding and menacing phase of the situation is not that he once had access to the purse of the Standard Oil Co., but that he is now attempting, with an audacity characteristic of Roosevelt alone, to carry out to the letter the pet policies of H. H. Rogers and John D. Archbold. Col. Roosevelt is, in a way, a thorough "progressive." He is far in advance of his former party associates in his energy and audacity in advocating the schemes of Perkins, Judge Gary, and other leaders in this propaganda for the licensing of organized lawlessness. This program of Federal control which Col. Roosevelt so strenuously advocates is not original with him, nor is it one of "my secondhand policies" purloined from Mr. Bryan or from Democratic platforms. A trust cuckoo laid that malodorous egg in the nest of "progressive" capitalism." Just which unclean bird is entitled to the honor I am not prepared to say, since Archbold, Rogers, Perkins, Gary, Garfield, and Herbert Knox Smith have been cackling around the nest ever since the colonel began to "set" on this unfledged scheme for the substitution of a bureau for courts, Congress, and the law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire if the gentleman will answer two questions?

Mr. STANLEY. Three, if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Then I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement, the gentleman from Oregon will proceed with his interrogatories.

Mr. STANLEY. And right here I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, that this idea of Federal incorporation 20 years ago was preached by Archbold and Rogers and John D. Rockefeller and all the other trust magnates all over the land in order that they might feed upon the unearned increment of monopoly and extortion long before Roosevelt and his progressives ever dreamed of advocating it. I wish to emphasize right here that the secret of successful, licensed, and unimpeded monopoly is to be found in the idea of abolishing Congress and the courts and giving to a bureau the right to say this is a good trust and that is a bad trust. The difference between Russia and America is the difference between the giving to a bureau of the Government and a government of the people through the legal and legally organized authorities the right to control monopoly. [Applause.] I will make those gentlemen on the other side of this aisle sick of this proposition of Federal incorporation before I am through, because I will show it is a foul liason between big business and big politicians.

Mr. LAFFERTY. First, I desire to inquire if the gentleman is not aware that Col. Roosevelt has denounced as absolutely false the allegations that he knew of the Standard Oil's contributions to his campaign fund in 1904?

Mr. STANLEY. I certainly know it; and here, my friend, I will state, I do not care how much he runs his avaricious fingers into the purse of the Standard Oil Co., so long as he does not deliver the goods to this monopoly. It is the policy of the Standard Oil I am now discussing, the very policy Roosevelt is now advocating.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Well, my second question is right along that line. Does the gentleman suppose that John D. Archbold now favors the Roosevelt policies being advocated by the Progressive Party, and does the gentleman consider the action of John D. Archbold in testifying yesterday, insinuating that Roosevelt accepted contributions in money in 1904, as indicative of the fact that Archbold is now favorable to Roosevelt?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not believe Archbold favors the Roosevelt policies; I know it. I defy you to show me a single solitary scheme for Federal incorporation John D. Archbold, Rockefeller, and the rest of them have ever advocated for 20 years which Roosevelt is not now defending.

Mr. LAFFERTY. My question was, Is not the action of Mr. Archbold, without corroboration, in stating that Roosevelt knew of this contribution one of the best proofs that Archbold is now opposed to Roosevelt?

Mr. STANLEY. That is a stage play. Archbold is praying, not to God, but to "the world, the flesh, and the devil," that Roosevelt may succeed.

On September 8, 1899, John D. Archbold appeared before the Industrial Commission in the advocacy of Federal incorporation.

If you should ask me—

Said he—

gentlemen, what legislation can be imposed to improve the present condition, I answer that the next great, and, to my mind, inevitable step of progress in the direction of our commercial development lies in the direction of national or Federal corporations.

Mr. H. H. Rogers, second only to Archbold in the prostitution of public servants, warmly seconded the suggestion of Mr. Archbold. Before the same commission he was asked by Mr. Clarke:

You favor Mr. Archbold's suggestion about conducting such large interests as you are now carrying on under a national corporation?

A. Most certainly.

Q. (Mr. A. L. Harris.) I should like to ask Mr. Rogers whether he has investigated that question from the legal standpoint, to know whether it can be done under the present Federal Constitution?

A. I should judge, from all I have heard, that it can not.

Q. (By Mr. Kennedy.) You would be in favor, then, of amending the Constitution so that it can be done?

A. I believe, if we are going to be the greatest commercial nation in the world, that the Constitution ought to be amended so that Federal charters can be granted on some such plan as the English.

On March 23, 1908, Mr. Hepburn introduced a bill providing for Federal incorporation or Federal license and control. Section 10 in this bill provides:

SEC. 10. That any corporation or association registered under this act, and any person, not a common carrier under the provisions of the said act approved February 4, 1887, or the acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, being a party to a contract or combination hereafter made, other than a contract or combination with a common carrier filed under section 11 of this act, may file with the Commissioner of Corporations a copy thereof, if the same be in writing, or if not in writing, a statement setting forth the terms and conditions thereof, together with a notice that such filing is made for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of the provisions of this section. Thereupon the Commissioner of Corporations, with the concurrence of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, of his own motion and without notice or hearing, or after notice and hearing, as the commissioner may deem proper, may enter an order declaring that in his judgment such contract or combination is in unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations. If no such order shall be made within 30 days after the filing of such contract or written statement, no prosecution, suit, or proceeding by the United States shall lie under the first six sections of this act, for or on account of such contract or combination, unless the same be in unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations; but the United States may institute, maintain, or prosecute a suit, proceeding, or prosecution under the first six sections of said act for or on account of any such contract or combination hereafter made, of which a copy or written statement shall not have been filed as aforesaid, or as to which an order shall have been entered as above provided.

No corporation or association for profit or having capital stock, and registered under this act, that hereafter shall make a combination or consolidation with any other corporation or association, shall be entitled to continue its registration under this act unless without delay it shall file with the Commissioner of Corporations, pursuant and subject to the provisions of this section, a statement setting forth the terms and conditions of such combinations or consolidation, together with a notice as hereinabove provided.

This bill was an ideal arrangement by which the Commissioner of Corporations was empowered to issue a plenary indulgence to every munificent monopoly which availed itself of the opportunity to swell the corruption funds of the Republican Party as the price of plundering the American people. This bill was so artfully worded, sounded so sweet, and smelt so bad that the suspicions of a good many thoughtful Democrats were aroused. On close inspection it betrayed the Italian hand of the corporation lawyer and the earmarks of high finance. The ardent and insistent advocacy of the then President of the United States tended to strengthen this suspicion. In a message on March 25, 1908, President Roosevelt advocated this measure, while fiercely assailing the Sherman Antitrust Act.

* * * In addition to the reasons I have already urged on your attention, it has now become important that there should be an amendment of the antitrust law, because of the uncertainty as to how this law affects combinations among labor men and farmers if the combination has any tendency to restrict interstate commerce. All of these combinations, if and while existing for and engaged in the promotion of innocent and proper purposes, should be recognized as legal. As I have repeatedly pointed out, this antitrust law was a most unwisely drawn statute. It was perhaps inevitable that in feeling after the right remedy the first attempts to provide such should be crude; and it was absolutely imperative that some legislation should be passed to control, in the interest of the public, the business use of the enormous aggregations of corporation wealth that are so marked a feature of the modern industrial world. But the present antitrust law, in its construction and working, has exemplified only too well the kind of legislation which, under the guise of being thoroughgoing, is drawn up in such sweeping form as to become either ineffective or else mischievous.

* * * It is mischievous and unwholesome to keep upon the statute books, unmodified, a law like the antitrust law, which, while in practice only partially effective against vicious combinations, has nevertheless, in theory, been construed so as sweepingly to prohibit every combination for the transaction of modern business. Some real good has resulted from this law. But the time has come when it is imperative to modify it.

* * * The Congress can not afford to leave it on the statute books in its present shape.

* * * A bill has been presented in the Congress to remedy this situation (Hepburn-Warner bill).

* * * The substantive part of the antitrust law should remain as at present; that is, every contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations should continue to be declared illegal; provided, however, that some proper governmental authority (such as the Commissioner of Corporations acting under the Secretary of Commerce and Labor) be allowed to pass on any such contracts.

* * * Probably the best method of providing for this would be to enact that any contract, subject to the prohibition contained in the antitrust law, into which it was desired to enter might be filed with the Bureau of Corporations or other appropriate executive body. This would provide publicity. Within, say, 60 days of the filing—which period could be extended by order of the department whenever for any reason it did not give the department sufficient time for a thorough examination—the executive department having power might forbid the contract, which would then be subject to the provisions of the antitrust law, if at all in restraint or undue.

On April 27, 1908, he again urged upon Congress the imperative necessity of enacting into law this mischievous and malodorous law.

Power should unquestionably be lodged somewhere in the executive branch of the Government to permit combinations which will further the public interest, but it must always be remembered that, as regards the great and wealthy combinations through which most of the interstate business of to-day is done, the burden of proof should be on them to show that they have a right to exist.

* * * No judicial tribunal has the knowledge or the experience to determine, in the first place, whether a given combination is advisable or necessary in the interest of the public. Some body, whether a commission or a bureau under the Department of Commerce and Labor, should be given this power.

* * * My personal belief is that ultimately we shall have to adopt a national incorporation law, though I am well aware that this may be impossible at present.

* * * There should be an efficient executive body created with power enough to correct abuses and scope enough to work out the complex problems that this great country has developed.

* * * Therefore it is clear that "unless a national incorporation law can be forthwith enacted some body or bodies in the executive service should be given power to pass upon any combination or agreement in relation to interstate commerce, and every such combination or agreement not thus approved should be treated as in violation of law and prosecuted accordingly.

The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and a subcommittee, on April 4, 1906, exposed the paternity of this offspring of the unholy political liaison between high officials in the Republican Party and the chairman of the board of directors and chief counsel of the steel corporation, as evidenced by the following colloquy between the chairman of the committee and the Hon. Seth Low:

The CHAIRMAN. Right there, Mr. Low, if there is no objection, who are the people that actually participated in the preparation of the bill? Who are the men who actually drew it?

Mr. LOW. We conferred with Mr. Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. E. H. Gary, president of their board of directors?

Mr. LOW. E. H. Gary, who is likely to be here this morning. He is in Washington, and I think he came on purpose for this meeting. The lawyers actually engaged in the drafting of the bill were Mr. Stetson——

The CHAIRMAN. That is, Francis Lynde Stetson?

Mr. LOW. Francis Lynde Stetson, and Mr. Morawetz.

The CHAIRMAN. Victor Morawetz?

Mr. LOW. Victor Morawetz. Prof. Jenks, of the federation, was in constant collaboration upon the subject. We also kept in close touch with the administrative department of the Government through the Bureau of Corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, Mr. Herbert Knox Smith?

Mr. LOW. Mr. Herbert Knox Smith; yes.

It developed in this investigation that this so-called Hepburn bill was not drawn by Mr. Hepburn at all. There was not an "i" dotted or a "t" crossed by any Member of this House. The whole infamous thing was incubated in Wall Street.

The great danger to this country from the ascendancy of Theodore Roosevelt and the coterie of capitalists who are supporting and financing him is not attributed so much to the fact that he is the recipient of dirty money as that he is the proponent of dangerous policies.

Let an honest, fearless, and capable administration enforce the more drastic and stringent provisions of the Sherman law against corporations and the penal provisions of that act against the officers in control of such corporation, and the Sherman Act can be rendered in a measure effective in restraining, if not preventing, combinations in restraint of trade. For that reason Col. Roosevelt proposes a repeal of the Sherman law and to abandon all suits brought under it for the dissolution of trusts or the punishment of those operating them. According to the "Bull Moose" theory, the Supreme Court of the United States is incapable of interpreting the law; Congress, and committees created by it, knows absolutely nothing about writing the law. The only people who can be trusted to prevent monopoly are those who have created monopolies and who are now fattening upon the rich fruits of extortion. The only punishment which we can safely inflict upon malefactors of great wealth who violate the law is such punishment as the malefactors themselves may be pleased to suggest.

Judge Gary, a few months ago, proposed to a subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate a bill providing for Federal incorporation and for the control of large concerns doing an interstate business by means of the Bureau of Corporations. This bill contains in full and in detail Roosevelt's whole scheme for Federal incorporation and Federal control. He never did while he was President, and he does not now, as a candidate, advocate any legislation looking toward the control of trusts or the extermination of a monopoly which trusts and monopolists do not themselves heartily indorse. He has been repeatedly asked whether or not he is in favor of dissolving the Harvester Trust. He said that he is against the dissolution of the Steel Corporation, and I defy him now to suggest one regulation for either one of these concerns, or one act punishing the lawlessness of the men at the head of them, which is not heartily approved by the very interests which he so blatantly denounces in glittering generalities and meaningless tirades.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. SULLOWAY] be allowed to print in the RECORD some remarks and extracts in regard to pensions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] may extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SULLOWAY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

MANAGERS OF THE NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House joint resolution 226. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] objected to it a moment ago, but has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 226) for the appointment of three members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Resolved, etc., That George H. Wood, of Ohio; John W. Farris, of Missouri; and Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, be, and they are hereby, appointed members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to succeed Oscar M. Gottshall, of Ohio; William Warner, of Missouri; and Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, whose terms of office will expire April 21, 1912.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the Clerk kindly report the names of the new managers?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 4, strike out the name of "Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey," and insert "Patrick H. Coney, of Kansas."

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. As I understand this resolution, when it left the House it contained the name of Franklin Murphy.

Mr. HAY. This is the House resolution reported by the House committee, amending the resolution by placing in the name of "Patrick H. Coney" instead of "Franklin Murphy."

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the reason I objected when the bill was called up a short time ago was that it was my understanding that the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Franklin Murphy, who, in addition to being consistently a regular Republican, and having had a very favorable war record, was, as I understood, unanimously indorsed by the New Jersey delegation for continuation on this board of managers.

Since that time, after a conference with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who espouses the cause of that God-fearing Irishman, Capt. Patrick H. Coney, I am constrained to withdraw my objection to it, since the New Jersey delegation were not united on Franklin Murphy. But had they been, my objection would still have been continued in force.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, by striking out the words "Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey," and inserting the words "Patrick H. Coney, of Kansas."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by striking out the words "will expire" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "expired."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting an analysis of the "Bull Moose" platform.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is a letter from Congressman PEPPER, of Iowa.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is it a newspaper editorial?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; this is a letter, as I say, from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEPPER] to the Davenport Times.

Mr. MANN. A letter from a Member of the House?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Does the gentleman object?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Following is the letter referred to:

Mr. PEPPER to-day summed up his conclusions as follows:

"Roosevelt announces in favor of the direct election of Senators. The Democratic House and the Republican Senate this session passed a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment for the direct election of Senators. Not until the Democratic majority in the House got behind the movement did it succeed. It failed year after year under the Republican régime, seven of these years under Mr. Roosevelt's régime.

LIMITATION ON CAMPAIGN FUNDS.

"Roosevelt now announces himself in favor of the limitation of campaign contributions and expenditures, and of publication of contributions and expenditures, both before and after the election. When Bryan proposed this in 1908, the third term candidate denounced it in his most vigorous manner.

"Roosevelt announces in favor of contempt injunction bills exactly similar to those passed by the House this session.

"He favors agricultural education and farm extension work. The House and Senate have more than quadrupled last year's appropriation for farm extension work. The House now has before it the Lever bill for agricultural education. This bill was indorsed by the Baltimore platform, as was the Democratic action on the farm extension appropriation.

NATIONAL HEALTH BUREAU.

"Mr. Roosevelt has a plank on a national health bureau. It reads almost word for word the same as the last paragraph of Senator OWEN'S report on his health bill. Whether that bill becomes law or not, Mr. Roosevelt can not claim to be the originator of the idea.

"His plank on sociological conditions is covered by the record of the House—by the passage of the eight-hour bill for Government employees, by the convict labor bill, the phosphorus-match bill, the seaman's bill, and the bill to create a commission on industrial relations.

"Mr. Roosevelt now favors the physical valuation of railroads. The Progressives in Congress have advocated this for years, and the Democratic Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has reported a bill providing for the physical valuation of railroads.

AS TO SWAMP LANDS.

"Mr. Roosevelt, in his conservation plank, advocates the reclaiming of swamp lands. The Democrats appropriated money for this work this year and the Baltimore platform specifically indorsed it.

"In his deep-waterway plank he favors national control of the Mississippi River and its levees. This is another Democratic project. The Baltimore platform declared the control of the Mississippi to be a national problem; so did the Republican platform; but the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House has been considering a measure providing for such national control ever since the great floods of this year began.

FREE TOLLS FOR COASTWISE TRADE.

"He favors free tolls for American coastwise vessels using the Panama Canal. The House passed this provision before his convention met and the Senate passed it before his convention adjourned.

"Mr. Roosevelt advocates a nonpartisan tariff board. In the legislative bill which was vetoed by the President last week there was a provision for a nonpartisan tariff board such as he recommends.

"Mr. Roosevelt favors an income tax. Only two States are needed to ratify a constitutional amendment providing for an income tax. The Democratic House passed a bill providing for an excise tax on all incomes of individuals and dividend-sharing corporations of $5,000 a year or over.

AS TO TREATY DISCRIMINATIONS.

"He declares against any treaty which permits discrimination against American citizens in foreign countries. This refers directly to the trouble between the United States and Russia over the Jewish passports. The House of Representatives started the movement last December which successfully ended in the abrogation of the treaty of 1832. During all the time he was President Mr. Roosevelt permitted this treaty to remain in force, notwithstanding the fact that the Jewish citizens of this country pleaded with him on bended knees to take some action in their behalf.

"Mr. Roosevelt says he is in favor of liberal pensions. The Democratic Party, once declared the enemy of the old soldier, is now accused of being too friendly to him. The Sherwood dollar-a-day pension bill, the most liberal measure of its kind ever advanced in Congress, was fathered by the Democratic majority of the House.

"He says he favors the coordination of bureaus which do the same work. The House has provided for this in many of the supply bills passed this session, one provision alone eliminating the expenditure of $230,000 for hauling documents from the Government Printing Office to the Department of Agriculture for addressing and then back to the Union Station, which is near the Printing Office, for shipping. The credit for this must go to the President's Economy Commission, so here is at least one plank which Mr. Roosevelt has taken from Mr. Taft.

AID FOR PUBLIC ROADS.

"Mr. Roosevelt also favors national aid for public roads. The Democratic House passed the first bill granting national aid to post roads.

"And among other things, Mr. Roosevelt is in favor of the Government's passing upon securities and investments. This anti 'blue-sky' plank seemed new at first, but the Democratic State convention of Nebraska, which met a week or so prior to Mr. Roosevelt's personally conducted convention, recommended such a law for Nebraska.

"Thus having declared himself in favor of all these Democratic accomplishments, Mr. Roosevelt proceeds to dodge the main issues now before the people with his customary ability in evasion. I defy any man to tell me what kind of a tariff program he will carry out if elected. His platform does not indicate. His record in the past shows he is afraid of the tariff.

AS TO THE TRUSTS.

"I challenge any man to tell me how he will regulate or control the trusts and railroads. The same as in his former terms, when the greatest concentration of big business in the world's history was consummated? In the Outlook on July 5, 1911, he said the Sherman antitrust law ought never to have been written and should be repealed. What does he say now? A few pleasant-sounding words of absolutely no meaning—the small talk of the parlor turned into the jolly of the political arena.

"Mr. Roosevelt is a remarkable and interesting man. He is also the least original of all our national figures. He has taken the record of the Democratic House of Representatives and paralleled it. He has taken the platform of the Democratic Party adopted at Baltimore and followed it—on all but the leading issues. Those he evades.

"Mr. Roosevelt is to be congratulated upon the fitness of his selections. But instead of trying to turn Democratic accomplishments into Roosevelt promises, he should tell clearly and concisely what he will do along the lines of revising the tariff downward, what he will do to control the railroads, and how he will deal with the trusts."

MEMORIAL TO MAJ. ARCHIBALD W. BUTT AND FRANCIS DAVIS MILLET.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 108. This resolution provides merely that a committee of patriotic Washington ladies, who have secured a fund, be permitted to erect a monumental fountain in the grounds back of the White House in commemoration of Maj. Butt and Francis Davis Millet, two victims of the Titanic disaster. I think that the wives of many of the Members of the House contributed to that fund. I would not have supposed that the permission of Congress is necessary, but good authority supposes that it is necessary, and I merely ask that the resolution, which has passed the Senate, be agreed to by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman where the location of this monument is to be?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is on a point of land running east in the grounds between the Executive Road of the White House Grounds and the baseball grounds.

Mr. CULLOP. It is not to be on any part of the White House Grounds?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, no. The resolution specifically states where it is to be placed.

Mr. CULLOP. There is to be no expense to the Government?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No. The money has been raised by the ladies of Washington by private subscription, and the plans are already drawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, so that all Members can hear, that this is a violation of the rule, but it would seem to be ungallant and churlish to object. It is simply to put up a bronze drinking fountain bearing a plate or tablet in memory of Maj. Butt and Mr. Millet. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington of a joint memorial to Maj. Archibald W. Butt and Francis Davis Millet.

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission for the erection on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a joint memorial, of simple and artistic form, to Maj. Archibald W. Butt, United States Army, and Mr. Francis Davis Millet, vice chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, officers of the United States who perished in the Titanic disaster: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the President of the United States upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD so as to complete the statement in reference to some of the work done and performed by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives at this session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, giving a history of the work of the Committee on the Territories during this Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in regard to the experiment station in northern California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to by Mr. RAKER is as follows:

A bill to establish, equip, and maintain an agricultural experiment station near the town of Dorris, Siskiyou County, Cal., and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of establishing, equipping, and maintaining an agricultural experiment station near the town of Dorris, Siskiyou County, Cal., under the care and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the provisions of this act to be fully carried out.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, August 17, 1912.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to yours of the 8th, 9th, and 10th instant, inclosing letters from the Dorris Hardware Co., affidavits from A. F. Padgett, dated May 20, 1912, and M. H. Madden, March 22, 1912, letter from Dr. E. J. Wickson, director of the California Experiment Station, dated April 11, 1912, and map, plat, and petition forwarded by citizens of Dorris under date of May 11, 1912, all bearing upon the question of the need of an experiment station at that point, very thorough consideration of these communications has been given in connection with the request of the Hon. JOHN LAMB, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, for comment on H. R. 26201, which proposes an appropriation for the establishment of an experiment station at Dorris. The result of that consideration I have embodied in a letter to Capt. LAMB, of which I inclose a copy herewith. As you will observe, I have indicated to Capt. LAMB that it would be quite contrary to the policy of the department to establish such a Federal station as suggested independently of the State experiment station. In some respects it would be peculiarly unfortunate to deviate from this policy in this instance at this time, inasmuch as a change has just occurred in the directorship of the California Experiment Station, Dr. T. F. Hunt having been appointed to succeed Director Wickson.

As the similar station which has been urged by some of the Oregon people for Klamath, Oreg., is in quite close proximity to Dorris, and as I understand that the Oregon people are already planning to take the matter up with their State legislature, I would suggest that opportunity be given the new director of the California station to take similar action along the lines discussed by Dr. Wickson in his letter of April 11 last.

In making the above suggestion I desire to express my full sympathy with the people of northern California in their need of an experiment station, and to further indicate that if such a station is established by the State that our experts in the various lines will be able to cooperate heartily and effectively in the prosecution of such research work as appears to be most important.

With a view to expediting as rapidly as possible the consideration of the matter by the State, I have taken the liberty of furnishing copies of your correspondence, and that with Director Wickson to Dr. T. F. Hunt, who I believe takes charge at Berkeley about October 1.

Very respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

AUGUST 17, 1912.

Hon. JOHN LAMB,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CAPT. LAMB: Replying to your memorandum of the 12th instant with inclosure of H. R. 26201, I would say that H. R. 26201 is a bill to establish, equip, and maintain an agricultural experiment station near the town of Dorris, Siskiyou County, Cal., under the care and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, introduced by the Hon. JOHN E. RAKER. Residents of Dorris and vicinity have for some time past urged the establishment of an experiment station there on the ground that there is a large area of land in northern California and the adjacent portions of southern Oregon and Nevada which, owing to its relatively high elevation—4,000 feet or more above sea level—and its relatively light rainfall—17 to 30 inches per annum—needs special assistance in the way of agricultural experimentation before agriculture can be established upon a sound and stable basis. From the statements that have been submitted by the people at Dorris and other evidence that is available it is quite clear that there is need of experimental work in that region to determine what crops can be profitably grown and what methods of culture, etc., should be adopted. The question requiring consideration by Congress in connection with this bill is apparently whether such needs as appear to exist at Dorris and in other localities should be met by the Federal Government or by the States in which they are located.

It has been the policy of this department to leave local work to the States and to encourage the authorities of the several States to provide for the establishment of such local stations with State funds. Where such stations have been established by the States it has been our policy to cooperate in such features of research work as this department may be better equipped in than are the State stations, and in this way to accomplish the solution of the important problems that present themselves. In my opinion this is the correct policy to be observed by the Federal Government, inasmuch as it leaves the primary responsibility for the meeting of local needs with the several States where it properly belongs, and protects them against any tendency on the part of the Federal department to encroach upon the field of the State experiment stations, which, as you know, are largely maintained by Federal appropriations. It also avoids needless duplication of work and the waste of funds and energy that would result from a system of Federal stations within the several States independent of those already in existence.

In this connection it should be noted, as indicated in the accompanying copy of letter from Dr. E. J. Wickson, director of the California Agricultural Experiment Station, to Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, which Mr. RAKER has furnished us, that this field is recognized by him as one which the State experiment station should occupy by establishing a substation similar to that which was recently established in the Imperial Valley in the extreme southeast corner of California to meet the local needs there. I am also advised that the Oregon Agricultural College is desirous of securing authority and funds from the Oregon State Legislature for the purpose of establishing an experiment farm in the Klamath region of Oregon, which is but a few miles north of Dorris in a district where climatic conditions are quite similar to those of the Butte Creek Valley in Siskiyou County, Cal., in which Dorris is located. This proposed Klamath station has been a matter of conference between the Bureau of Plant Industry, of this department, and the authorities of the Oregon Agricultural College, and it is planned that after the station is established by the State cooperative relations between it and the Bureau of Plant Industry will be arranged. As previously indicated, the same arrangement could be made with any station that California may establish in Butte Creek Valley, thus enabling the Federal experts to assist the State experiment stations in the most effective way without building up and maintaining an unnecessary number of such stations.

For your information I am inclosing copies of some previous correspondence with regard to the proposed stations at both Dorris, Cal., and Klamath, Oreg. I am also sending a copy of this letter to Mr. RAKER.

Very truly, yours, SECRETARY.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. MANN, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. CULLOP to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 4.30 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed its session.

AMERICAN-GROWN TOBACCO.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 7409) to constitute a commission to investigate the purchase of American-grown tobacco by the Governments of foreign countries, which bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I thought that the leave to take up these bills by unanimous consent was not to extend any further than 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The agreement was that Members could call up bills on the Private Calendar until 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOP. Is this bill on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is not, and if it were it would not be within that agreement. The Chair will state what he knows, and that is that when the House established a Unanimous Consent Calendar it seems to have intended that the Speaker should not recognize anybody for unanimous consent, and the Speaker determined to adhere to that rule except in cases of emergency.

Mr. CULLOP. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. We had better have the bill reported, and then the gentleman can reserve his right.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission consisting of three Senators, to be chosen by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be chosen by the Speaker, is hereby created; such commission is empowered to investigate the conditions under which the Governments of foreign countries purchase American-grown tobacco, and whether there is any combination or understanding between the representatives of said foreign Governments with a view of depressing the price of American-grown tobacco. The commission shall report the results of its investigations to the Congress. The sum of $10,000 to defray the expenses of the commission, including the expenses of witnesses and clerical work, is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to have the gentleman from Virginia explain the matter of his bill and what is intended to be accomplished by it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there is a deplorable condition of affairs among the growers of what is known as export tobacco. This tobacco is bought largely by Governments that buy, manufacture, and sell it, and by the English Government, that has a large import duty. In my section of the tobacco-growing belt they buy the very best grades of tobacco we raise and have put the price of that tobacco down to a price that is less than it costs to produce it. Our idea is not that we could force these Governments to give more for it, but that if these facts were brought out clearly and made public in an official way they could be induced to give more.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Is it contended by the tobacco producers that the tobacco is sold in foreign countries for less than the producer sells it here at home?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, no; these foreign countries themselves buy their tobacco here on our market, and for the grades of tobacco they buy there is no other purchaser than the Governments themselves, so there is really no competition. It is not manufactured in these countries that buy the tobacco by individuals, but these countries through their agents buy the tobacco themselves, manufacture, and sell it—France, Japan, Austria, Italy, and Spain, and such countries; and the contention is that the price they pay for it on our markets now is far less than it is worth and is below the cost of production.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman know what the import duty on tobacco is in France?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. They have no import duty on tobacco. France buys tobacco herself. The Government buys it and manufactures and sells it. In England there is an import duty of 88 cents per pound on tobacco and 89 cents on tobacco strips.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman says it is free of duty in France?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. In France there is no duty because the Government is the purchaser.

Mr. CULLOP. What is the duty there where the citizen is the purchaser?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The citizen is not allowed to purchase it. He can only purchase the tobacco in the manufactured state.

Mr. CULLOP. Then the Government is in the tobacco business?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. And the purpose of this is——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. To see what combination, if any, exists between the Governments to get our tobacco too cheaply and to see if we can not induce them to give us a better price.

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the gentleman think the resolution ought to be broad enough to investigate the tobacco conditions as to the control of the product in this country as well as in other countries?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think so, but I think we should take one at a time. I would rather not have the bill amended. It is a Senate bill, and if this proves a good thing with reference to the regi buyers, we can also proceed with reference to the local buyers.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman then gives the House to understand that the passage of this measure would be a benefit to the tobacco farmers and producers of this country.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think it would be of great benefit.

Mr. CULLOP. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. There is another bill on the calendar proposing to give the State Department authority to make an investigation of the purchase of tobacco by foreign countries, to ascertain whether those countries would be willing to make an arrangement under which they would buy their State monopoly tobacco directly from a tobacco bureau to be maintained by the Government of the United States. That bill would involve, first, the establishment of a bureau of tobacco, or a bureau for the sale of tobacco, by the United States, although it first provides that we ascertain if foreign countries would be willing to buy their tobacco in that way before we agree to establish the bureau. If this bill passes, does the gentleman think it will obviate any necessity for the consideration of the other bill during the next session of Congress?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I can not say that, but I rather hope this bill will do all that we could accomplish by the other bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS BIG SANDY RIVER IN VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 7410) to authorize the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway to construct bridges across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof in the States of Virginia and Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill referred to and consider the same at this time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 7410) to authorize the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway to construct bridges across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof in the States of Virginia and Kentucky.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway, a corporation created, organized, and existing under the laws of the State of Virginia, its successors and assigns, be, and they hereby are, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate bridges, with single or double tracks, and approaches thereto, over and across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof, in the States of Virginia and Kentucky, at such points as it may now or hereafter be desired, for the passage of railway engines, cars, and trains, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CULLOP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have taken from the Speaker's table the bill S. 7411 and that it be considered and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 7411) to authorize the Clinchfield Northern Railway, of Kentucky, to construct bridges across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof in the States of Kentucky and Virginia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Clinchfield Northern Railway, of Kentucky, a corporation created, organized, and existing under the laws of the State of Kentucky, its successors and assigns, be, and they hereby are, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate bridges, with single or double tracks, and approaches thereto over and across the Big Sandy River and the branches thereof, in the States of Kentucky and Virginia, at such points as it may now or hereafter be desired, for the passage of railway engines, cars, and trains, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CULLOP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 22340. An act to regulate foreign commerce by prohibiting the admission into the United States of certain adulterated grain and seeds unfit for seeding purposes;

H. J. Res. 360. Joint resolution providing for the payment of the salaries of the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session; and

H. R. 7437. An act for the relief of Patrick Howe.

ALASKA NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2454 and that it be considered and passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill indicated. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk reads as follows:

An act (S. 2534) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Northern Railway, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the purpose of taking it from the Speaker's table?

Mr. BOOHER. I want to consider and pass it. It was passed by the Senate and referred to the Committee on Territories and has been amended and returned to the House.

Mr. MANN. Has it been reported?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. In the House?

Mr. BOOHER. No; the Senate bill has been reported back to the House. The Senate passed the bill and it was referred to the House Committee on Territories, and the House committee has reported it back to the House. Of course it is not on the Speaker's table, but it is on the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN. What is the number of it?

Mr. BOOHER. It is Senate bill 2534.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask to have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill is all stricken and there is a substitute, and there is no use in reading the bill, and therefore the Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

An act (S. 2534) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Northern Railway, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for filing the map and maps of definite location of the Alaska Northern Railway, formerly known as the Alaska Central Railway, of its branches, station grounds and terminal grounds, and junction and division terminals provided and required by the act entitled "An act for extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, both within and without reservations and withdrawals, be, and the same hereby is, extended until three years after the passage of this act, and the time for completing the railway is hereby extended until two years after the filing of said maps; and leave is hereby granted to the Alaska Northern Railway Co., its successors and assigns, to file said map and maps of definite location within the time and the times therefor as above provided: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to have the effect of renewing or reviving any grant of title to real estate under the act of June 30, 1906, or any subsequent act which may have already lapsed or become forfeited: Provided further, That in case the United States shall at any time desire to acquire, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, said railroad, the extension herein made and the right of way secured thereby shall not be deemed or held to constitute any asset or value owned by said Alaska Northern Railway Co., its assigns or successors, above actual cost of the survey and locations thereof, as to any part of said right of way upon or over which said railroad shall not be actually constructed at the time of such purchase or condemnation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken and the substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOOHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the conferees on the deficiency bill have not yet reached an agreement. The papers are in the Senate, and I understand that the Senate has taken a recess until 6 o'clock. I therefore move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House take a recess until half past 7.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair puts the motion I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, under the interstate-commerce law passed in 1906 and amended by the act of June, 1910, no question can be made in any court against an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission except by a rail carrier that has been ordered by the commission to either do some particular thing it was not doing or cease and desist from doing something it was then doing. In order to test the validity of such an order the railroad company has to bring an original suit to stay, annul, suspend, vacate, or enjoin the order, and no suit for such a purpose can be brought except upon the charge that the commission, in making the order, has exceeded the powers delegated to it by Congress or that the order is in effect confiscatory of the railroad's property and violative of the fifth amendment to the Constitution. If the court finds the commission has exceeded its powers or that its order is confiscatory, it will hold the order void and perpetually enjoin same.

These orders are affirmative orders, and in the very nature of things can not apply to the shipper, as the commission never orders a shipper either to do or not to do anything.

After the Commerce Court was established that court held that it had the power to review what is called a negative order of the commission; that is, where the commission, after full hearing, refuses to make an order against a common carrier and dismisses the petition seeking to have an affirmative order made. The Commerce Court made this decision in what is known as the Procter & Gamble case. This case was carried to the Supreme Court and was recently decided by that court, Chief Justice White delivering the opinion of the court, which was unanimous, in which it was held the Commerce Court had no jurisdiction to review any negative order of the commission, that only affirmative orders of the commission are subject to court review.

There was a large number of tap-line railroad cases pending before the Commerce Court wherein the Interstate Commerce Commission had held that said roads were only plant facilities as to the shipments of certain proprietary lumber companies and not common carriers as to such mills and refused to allow a division of the freight charge made by the trunk-line roads carrying lumber from these sawmills served by the tap lines to the markets. When the Procter & Gamble case was decided by the Supreme Court the Commerce Court dismissed these tap-line cases, as all of them involved the same question of court review of the negative action of the commission.

The attorneys representing these industrial tap-line roads immediately sought to have bills introduced and passed by Congress giving jurisdiction to the Commerce Court to pass on the validity of these negative orders of the commission, and one of these bills was favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Chief Justice White, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Procter & Gamble case, in commenting on the effect of giving the Commerce Court jurisdiction to pass on negative orders of the commission, said:

> To give to the statute a meaning contrary to that which we have found results from its text, and therefore to recognize the existence in the court below of the power which it deemed it possessed would result in frustrating the legislative public policy which led to the adoption of the act to regulate commerce, would render impossible a resort to the remedies which the statute was enacted to afford, would multiply the evils which the act to regulate commerce was adopted to prevent, and thus bring about disaster by creating confusion and conflict where clearness and unity of action was contemplated.

Mr. Speaker, to give the Commerce Court or any court the power to pass on negative orders of the commission by act of Congress can not be less injurious, because done by legislation instead of by interpretation, as did the Commerce Court. The effect of such jurisdiction must be the same however obtained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House take a recess until half past 7.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House stood in recess until 7.30 p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in order that I may put a résumé of the work of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House not to exceed five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, we are just about entering upon a national campaign. Those of us who have had some experience, especially in our section of the country, know some of the methods resorted to by our political opponents to win elections. I recollect two years ago in my district a certain post-office inspector, drawing a monthly salary and a per diem, visited my section of the country, and in certain towns in my district he called upon the postmaster and requested him to notify all of the rural carriers to meet him at his hotel on a certain night. Of course they obeyed that summons. He told them that they were not expected to take any part in the campaign, but he made a false statement to them that the Democratic Party was opposed to rural free delivery.

Of course, he must have known that statement was false, because the first bill ever introduced providing for rural free delivery was introduced by a Democrat, and the first route ever established was established under Democratic administration. But he said to them, "I want to make this suggestion to you. If the Democratic Party should come into power, you are liable to lose your position, because rural free delivery would be abolished. This is only made as a suggestion to you," said he, "and you can act upon it if you desire to do so."

Now, then, thus early in the campaign there comes to me this letter which simply shows the methods already put in vogue by the Republican Party in certain sections of the country, and I desire to read it. It is as follows:

> TREASURER'S OFFICE,
> ARKANSAS REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE,
> Little Rock, July 25, 1912.
> DEAR SIR: In the opinion of some the Republican Party is at the present juncture facing the gravest period of its existence since 1876. Deserted by some of its former foremost leaders, it finds others who, although still claiming the name and prestige of Republicanism, are giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the party.
> A vigorous campaign has been planned by the Republican executive committee, which will entail heavy expenditures for literature, speakers' traveling expenses, postage, fees for certifying candidates, and other legitimate expenses.
> After advising with others prominent in the party's councils, you are asked to come to the assistance of the party with a remittance for $30. Such a remittance from you, added to others, will go to create a fund that must be raised from some source. A small amount from many will create a larger body interested in the party welfare. A receipt will be mailed you for what you remit.
> Arkansas Republicans, casting more than 36,000 votes, enjoying the fruits of universal prosperity, should cheerfully contribute something in defense of their party and to help to maintain the present stable basis of business throughout the country and to advance their party in Arkansas.
> This call has been made on you late in the season. Kindly take this into consideration, and make your remittance immediately.
> Faithfully, yours,
> GORDON H. CAMPBELL, Treasurer.

On the envelope which inclosed this letter is this indorsement:

> NOTICE.—This letter not to be opened in a building occupied by the Government in the transaction of official business.
> Return in five days to Gordon H. Campbell, Little Rock, Ark.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know, and I do not undertake to say, that the Republican national committee acquiesces in or indorses this kind of blackmail, and it is nothing else, upon the rural carriers of this country, but unless some open and public repudiation of the action of the Republican committee of the State of Arkanas is made, I think we are warranted in concluding that it meets the approval of the national organization.

I am a friend of the rural carriers in this country. Those boys have not yet received adequate compensation for the work which they perform, and I do not believe that they should be held up by any political party, I care not which one it is, and compelled to contribute to any political campaign fund. And I want the country to know it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, as I stated, I append herewith an epitome of the work done by the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, as follows:

> Immediately after the appointment of the committee in the House in April, 1911, as chairman of this committee I called a meeting and organized and proceeded at once to try to carry out the duties enjoined upon the committee by law. It appears that this committee had done practically no work whatever for nearly 30 years, and yet there had been handled through the State Department millions of dollars of public money without any investigation on the part of Congress as to how and in what manner said money had been expended. Early in our work we discovered that instead of having the cooperation of the Department of State in making this investigation, we had their hearty and most active opposition. Practically all irregularities which may exist in that department (like all other departments) are known almost exclusively by parties in the department, and of course the subordinates in these departments do not feel at liberty to testify to any irregularities for fear of losing their positions. Consequently we had to dig out the information which we got in the best way we could, but I feel that our committee succeeded in developing a state of facts which has already been of great benefit to the people of this country, and has had the effect of bringing about certain reforms and will continue to bear fruit throughout years yet to come.
> On account of the fact that no investigation of this department had been made for a long series of year there had grown up in the department a very loose and dangerous practice, as the following facts will show:
> Each year we appropriate a certain sum of money, the same being $90,000 per year for the last several years, known as the emergency or secret fund. This is given to the President to be expended through the State Department in matters growing out of our relation to foreign countries, and the President is permitted, under the law, in making settlements with the Treasury Department, to simply report the expenditure of this money in a lump sum or secret certificate, namely, without giving an itemized statement of the purpose for which this money was used. The present President and State Department have construed that law to permit them to expend this money and not be compelled to account to any person or department of the Government as to the purpose for which it was used. It will be seen at a glance that, if this construction is to prevail, it gives the executive department of the Government carte blanche in the expenditure of this money, and it ought not to be surprising that evils and irregularities have grown out of this very loose and dangerous procedure.

Early in our investigation we discovered that a few years ago the State Department ordered the painting of a portrait of ex-Secretary of State William R. Day, now Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, for which the artist was to receive, including the frame, $850. The evidence showed that this portrait was paid for out of the emergency or secret fund above referred to. But, in the judgment of the committee, that was not the worst part of it. Instead of drawing out only $850 to be used for the payment of the portrait, the disbursing officer of the State Department, on the verbal order of the chief clerk of said department, drew out $2,450, and the committee was unable to trace the expenditure of but $850, leaving $1,600 in the hands of the chief clerk of the department unsatisfactorily accounted for. On the strength of which our committee reported a resolution to the House recommending the dismissal, for the good of the service, of the disbursing officer and the (then) chief clerk (now consul general at Calcutta, India). This resolution was passed more than a year ago, but up to date the President seems to have taken no action

We also developed the fact that in the last six fiscal years there was expended through the State Department and covered by secret certificates in settlement with the Treasury the enormous sum of $732,981.52, or an average of $339 45 a day, while the record shows that Congress had only appropriated for emergency purposes $575,000 for that same period of time. When our committee had developed these facts the department was forced to concede, in order to make the figures tally, that they had expended large sums of money which Congress had appropriated for specific purposes (like bringing home criminals, Canadian commission, and the celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain, etc.), and covered those expenditures by secret certificates—things which were clearly not contemplated by law. After developing this condition of affairs our committee recommended the passage of a bill providing for the appointment of a standing committee to be composed of three Members of the House, together with three Members of the Senate, to which committee the President should report on the first day of each session of Congress in detail how the money given to him for emergency or secret purposes had been expended. This bill is now on the calendar of the House and we feel it ought to be passed. The position of our committee is that inasmuch as this money is made available to be expended by the President and State Department it must be appropriated by Congress, then Congress ought to know specifically how it is being used, and if the executive department declines to give to Congress this information (and they have so declined), then, in our judgment, not one dollar of money should be appropriated.

Our committee also developed that there has grown up in the department the practice, in some instances at least, of carrying parties on the pay roll and assigned to certain duties, when as a matter of fact these parties do not perform those duties—at least not constantly—but are sometimes used in private capacities. This, of course, can not be too severely condemned. Recently we developed the fact that there was a negro put on the pay roll of the State Department, not through civil service but by Executive order, and assigned to the mail room of that department at a salary of $1,200 per year. The chief of that department testified before our committee that this negro had been on the pay roll and assigned to his division for about three years, but during that time had not served in that capacity more than one-third of the time. It also developed that at the time our committee investigated these facts this negro was off on a cruise with the Secretary of State, acting as the Secretary's valet, but, of course, still on the pay roll of the Government at $1,200 per year.

Our committee developed many other things, which the majority of the committee at least believes should be condemned, but which space forbids me to enumerate here.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the conferees have not yet reached an agreement on the general deficiency bill, and I move that the House take a recess until 9 o'clock p. m.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish the gentleman would withhold that request for just a moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is the gentleman's bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is on the Speaker's table, but has not yet gone to the committee. It is to eliminate a part of North Dakota Avenue from the permanent system of highways plan.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentlemen that I do not like to interfere with their bills, but these bills are in violation of the rule, and I do not think it is fair for us to embarrass the Speaker. But I will yield for these unanimous-consent requests, with the understanding that I will move a recess when we are through.

ELIMINATION OF PART OF NORTH DAKOTA AVENUE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 7165) entitled "An act to authorize the elimination of part of North Dakota Avenue from the permanent system of highways plan."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill S. 7165, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 7165) to authorize the elimination of part of North Dakota Avenue from the permanent system of highways plan.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to eliminate North Dakota Avenue NW., between Third Street on the east and Georgia Avenue on the west, from the permanent system of highways plan for the District of Columbia, adopted in accordance with the provisions contained in the act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside the cities," and an amendment to said act approved June 28, 1898.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know something about what this bill means and where it applies.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. On the system of highways for the District of Columbia, North Dakota Avenue is laid out to extend entirely through the District to the Maryland line. That has already been interrupted by the erection of the Walter Reed Army Hospital, so that it is impossible for North Dakota Avenue ever to be extended to the District line without destroying that property. It is now desired to stop North Dakota Avenue two or three squares this side of that. The avenue has never been opened and no work has ever been done upon it, and can not be if this bill passes. There are ample streets there for the accommodation of the public.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It comes in west of Georgia Avenue?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. In the northwestern section of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will not object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CORBETT TUNNEL.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 134 and ask for its present consideration and passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) appropriating money for the payment of certain claims on account of labor, supplies, materials, and cash furnished in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the proposition now?

Mr. RAKER. Just the same as I told the gentleman before.

Mr. MANN. Is that agreeable now?

Mr. RAKER. I think so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman proposes to offer an amendment?

Mr. RAKER. Yes, sir; I propose to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Has the resolution been read? I would like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has been read two or three times to-day already. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the resolution on the ground that it has already been read several times.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States the sum of $42,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of and to be paid to those persons who have and hold and who have presented, or may present, claims, remaining unpaid, on account of labor, supplies, materials, or cash furnished to the contractor or the subcontractor in the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, as a part of the Shoshone irrigation project, in the State of Wyoming, under any contract or contracts let for that purpose by the Government of the United States; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to forthwith, and as soon as may be, investigate, hear evidence about, determine, and declare the several amounts due and remaining unpaid on account thereof, and to whom so due, and to certify the amounts due to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized to pay the several amounts so ascertained to the persons entitled to the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I send up an amendment to strike out, on lines 3 and 4 of page 1, the words "the Treasury of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof the words "any moneys in the reclamation fund in the Treasury."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, lines 3 and 4, by striking out the words "the Treasury of the United States" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "any moneys in the reclamation fund in the Treasury."

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard in opposition to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment again. The Chair could not understand it; neither could anybody else.

Mr. RAKER. It is to strike out, in lines 3 and 4, the words "the Treasury of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof "any moneys in the reclamation fund in the Treasury."

The amendment was again read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, the circumstances surrounding this claim may be briefly told. A contract was let for the building of the Corbett Tunnel, in connection with the Shoshone irrigation project. A number of people residing in Butte, Mont., advanced money, materials, and labor in the construction of this work. They have not been paid. That is to say, there has been default in the payments of these claims to the extent of $42,000. A Mrs. McDonald, who was in the grocery business with her husband, advanced provisions and groceries to the extent of $12,000. Mrs. McDonald has been here in Washington for the past two months in behalf of securing legislation that would result in the payment of these claims.

The bill passed through the Senate some time ago directing that the Secretary of the Interior ascertain the amounts due the parties and pay the amounts out of the Treasury of the United States. When that bill came to the House it was considered in the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and it was determined by that committee that this $42,000 ought to be charged to this particular reclamation project, because the $42,000 advanced for labor, materials, and subsistence went into the construction of this project. The project has been benefited to the extent of $42,000, and therefore the House Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands amended the Senate bill, providing that it should be charged against that particular project.

Now, then, when the bill came over here, it passed the House, went back to the Senate, and the Senate agreed to the House amendments. Thereupon the President vetoed the bill, on the ground that it would raise the price of these lands irrigated by the project to the extent of 33 cents to 90 cents an acre. The bill was sent back to the Senate, that being the body wherein it originated, and the Senate, by a vote of 42 as against 17, overrode the President's veto. Then the bill came to the House. The House, by a vote of 138 to seventy-odd, refused to override the President's veto, there being 6 votes lacking of the necessary two-thirds. The present resolution, directing that the money be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, the same as the original Senate bill provided, was thereupon introduced and has passed the Senate.

The bill now comes up again before the House. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says he would have raised an objection to the consideration of the resolution except for the fact that he understood there would be no objection to this amendment, taxing this sum against the reclamation fund.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, a number of Members of this House refused to vote to override the presidential veto upon the ground that the $42,000 to be paid to these people would be taxed against the Shoshone irrigation project and would raise the price of those lands 33 cents an acre, or a little more. The proposition embodied in the amendment desired by the gentleman from Illinois, which has just been offered by the gentleman from California, would place the burden of the $42,000 against all of the irrigation projects of the West. When the veto of the President was before the House a number of Members said they would be glad to vote for a proposition to pay this $42,000 out of the General Treasury of the United States, but they did not want to tax it against the reclamation lands that settlers have to go upon; that it was a mistake on the part of the General Government not to take a sufficient bond from the contractor, and as the bond taken was only $75,000 and the bill that we attempted to pass over the President's veto simply authorized these claimants to sue upon that bond, they would take it out of the Treasury, out of the general fund; but the Reclamation Service said as these claimants would recover upon the bond it would prevent the Government from recovering to that extent and would accordingly raise the price of these lands. There are three possible propositions in paying this money——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not think this would be a charge upon any project under this resolution.

Mr. LAFFERTY. It would be a charge on all projects.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. It would not be charged to any fund.

Mr. LAFFERTY. It would reduce the reclamation fund to the extent of $42,000. There are three possible ways in which this money could be paid. It could be charged up to the reclamation project that received the benefit of this labor and material. It could be paid and charged up to all of the reclamation work, as is now proposed by this amendment, or it could be charged up to the General Treasury. I favor passing the resolution. That is embodied in the resolution as it stands and as it has been passed by the Senate. For these reasons I favor passing the resolution without the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, just a word. I voted to pass the bill over the President's veto. This bill proposes another way of reaching the matter. The bill that was vetoed proposed to charge the amount against the Shoshone irrigation project, which would put it as a burden upon the land irrigated. This is the proposition that now comes up before the House. There are a great many irrigation projects, and there may be shortage in the way of the payment of materials and labor in a number of them at different times. If that shortage is to be paid out of the General Treasury, there is no one who would have any special reason for scanning the items or objecting to the amount of the payment of improper claims; but if it shall be paid out of the reclamation fund, as a general fund, all of the gentlemen in this House and in the Senate who are interested in irrigation States will scan those items with severe criticism; and then, I think, there would be no danger in that way of claims being paid about which there is any doubt; but if we once embark upon the proposition of paying the reclamation-project expenses out of the General Treasury we are lost.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the resolution, as it is amended or proposed to be amended, proposes the payment of these claims out of the general reclamation fund, not to be charged to any particular project. That being the case, I have no objection whatever, and think the resolution ought to pass. I want to have that entirely clear, however, so that there will be no misunderstanding on that point, and I understand there is none.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on line 9, page 1, by adding the words "and used" after the word "subcontractor."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by inserting after the word "subcontractor" the words "and used."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 4, by inserting after the word "unpaid" the words "if any."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 362) was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, there be substituted for the word "hereafter," where it first occurs in the first proviso under the heading "Pay of officers of the line," the words "on and after December 15, 1912."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to entitle the bill, "A joint resolution amending the Army appropriation bill."

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be entitled in conformity with the text if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

PROOF OF SIGNATURES AND HANDWRITING.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the better administration of public justice, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20102) relating to proof of signatures and handwriting, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any proceeding before a court or officer of the United States where the genuineness of the handwriting of any person may be involved, any admitted or proved handwriting of such person shall be competent evidence as a basis for comparison by witnesses, or by the jury, court, or officer conducting such proceeding, to prove or disprove such genuineness.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I may say that this bill is urged by the Department of Justice, and it is found to be essential for the better administration of public justice in the courts, particularly in matters where the fraudulent use of the mail is involved. The report in the case, which I shall not detain the House to read, shows the necessity for this legislation. A number of Federal judges in different parts of the country have urged the passage of this legislation, and it has the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question, if he will yield.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Wherein does this change the rule from what it is now?

Mr. CLAYTON. The rule of evidence which controls in criminal cases in Federal courts is the obsolete common-law rule that any admittedly genuine specimens of handwriting are inadmissible for the purpose of comparison, unless such specimens are already in evidence or are competent for other purposes. This is true, because the decisions have held that the rule of evidence obtaining in the Federal courts in any State is that which was in effect at the time of the admission of the State into the Union, unless Congress has provided otherwise. I will say to the gentleman that the law is expounded in the case of Logan v. United States (144 U. S., 263, 298, 303) and in Withaup v. United States (127 Fed. Rep., 532).

Mr. CULLOP. I understand now what it is; but I could not understand from the reading of the bill what the change is.

Mr. CLAYTON. It changes the rule by admitting into evidence for purposes of comparison by the court and jury and those prosecuting the inquiry admittedly genuine handwriting of the person accused, whereas under the rule obtaining in the Federal courts admittedly genuine handwriting can not be admitted for the purpose of comparison; and I may say, Mr. Speaker, that nearly all of the States in the Union, if not all of them, have conformed to the rule proposed in this bill, and to the reform advocated in this bill. It is reformatory legislation, and brings the rules of evidence in the Federal court up abreast of the rules of evidence which obtain in the State courts.

Mr. HAMLIN. And nothing except admittedly genuine handwriting can be used.

Mr. CLAYTON. Nothing except admittedly genuine handwriting.

Mr. BATHRICK. Do I understand this bill is intended to assist courts in determining evidence in cases of fraud committed through the mails?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is one the purposes of it, and in any criminal case where it is essential to compare the handwriting of the accused person, and to prove it by introducing in evidence the genuine handwriting of the accused, it would be admitted in that case whether it was a fraud-order case or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr LAFFERTY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this admitted handwriting is to be introduced in evidence for all purposes or merely for the purpose of comparison by these expert witnesses?

Mr. CLAYTON. This in the bill:

Shall be competent evidence as a basis for comparison by witnesses, or by the jury, court, or officer conducting such proceeding, to prove or disprove such genuineness.

That language is in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMITTEES, COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the committees appointed by Mr. MOON of Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The committees appointed by Mr. MOON of Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, under the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, were: Committee on Pneumatic Tubes—Mr. BLACKMON of Alabama and Mr. MURDOCK of Kansas. Committee on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation for Railway Mail Service—Mr. LLOYD of Missouri, Mr. TUTTLE, of New Jersey, and Mr. WEEKS of Massachusetts. Committee on the Post Roads—Mr. SHACKLEFORD of Missouri, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr. MCGILLICUDDY of Maine, Mr. MADDEN of Illinois, and Mr. AUSTIN of Tennessee.

COMMISSION ON PARCEL POST.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the names of members of the Commission on the Parcel Post appointed by the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FINLEY of South Carolina, Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, and Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey.

[Applause.]

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 9 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. The Senate took a recess until 8.30.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend my motion by making it a quarter past 9.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama modifies his motion—that the House take a recess until a quarter past 9.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House stood in recess until 9.15.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

House joint resolution 362.

Resolved, etc., That in the "act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," there be substituted for the word "hereafter," where it first occurs in the first proviso under the heading "Pay of officers of the line," the words "on and after December 15, 1912."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2534) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Northern Railway, and for other purposes.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the general deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
T. U. SISSON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.
F. E. WARREN,
JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the general deficiency bill as it passed the House carried $6,185,238.24. The Senate added, by amendments, $5,515,607.51. Since 10 o'clock this morning the managers upon the part of the two Houses have been in conference. There is no difficulty in adjusting the differences, with the exception of about a dozen different amendments. Tentatively, the House has receded upon amendments aggregating $1,063,236.45, and the Senate has receded on items carrying $418,237.46, and there are still in dispute items aggregating $4,034,133.60. Every one of these items, in the opinion of the managers upon the part of the House, must be given up by the Senate before this bill can be agreed to. This bill carries appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the expenses of various services of the Government. It is not to be made a general hodgepodge to carry all questionable and hoary-headed claims against the Government since its very existence. [Applause.] Of the items still in dispute, one is to pay $60,000 to those who, in 1904, contributed money to permit the ransom of Miss Ellen M. Stone, and another item in connection with a public building at Charlotte, N. C. Under existing law an appropriation of $250,000 is available to add an extension to the building. It is now desired, without any investigation, without any recommendation of the character that can be acted upon, to give authority for the demolition of the present building and to erect a new one in its stead. Then, there is the claim of four States, the State of Virginia, claiming $120,000, going back to the year 1790; the claim of the State of Maryland for $72,000, originating at the same time; a claim for money which it is contended was advanced by those States to enable the Federal Government to erect the Capitol in Washington. Various opinions are had as to the legality of those claims, but without passing upon them—never having had an opportunity to make that full investigation which should be made of them before the House could agree—the managers upon the part of the House declined to permit this bill—carrying essential appropriations for the payment of moneys which are needed to meet obligations incurred in the ordinary conduct of the Government—to be a vehicle to make possible the payment of these moneys.

The State of Texas has a claim originating prior to 1859. Some three or four years ago Congress appropriated $375,000, supposedly in full discharge of the claim which originated at that time. It is a claim urged to reimburse the State of Texas for placing in the field Texas troops to repel the invasion from Mexico and to suppress certain Indian insurrections. The contention is that after the claim was paid many vouchers which had been lost sight of, bundled together in old storerooms of the State capitol, were discovered after a fire, and upon these vouchers it is now claimed there is due an additional $217,000.

The State of Oregon, not to be behind, has a claim somewhat different, but for reimbursement for the equipment of troops aggregating $193,543.02.

An item of $55,000 to protect Valdez, Alaska, against the glacial floods has been placed upon this bill. It was on the river and harbor bill, and it held up agreement on that bill for some eight weeks. The Senate finally receded from its amendment on the river and harbor bill and is insisting at this late hour that the managers on the part of the House on the deficiency bill shall yield and permit that appropriation to be made.

A very long amendment was inserted in the bill on the floor of the Senate last night, creating a bureau of public works. The House in the sundry civil bill passed a provision to repeal the Tarsney Act. It was the initiation of a movement designed to correct glaring abuses in connection with our public buildings and to pave the way for whatever constructive legislation may be necessary. One particular gentleman, very much interested in the matter, prepared an amendment, and, without consideration by any committee, either of the Senate or the House, it has been incorporated in the bill and is still in disagreement.

There is in the bill an item to pay the employees of the two Houses an extra month's compensation. It is a matter upon which the Democratic caucus passed at the very beginning of this Congress, and one on which the managers on the part of the House can not possibly yield.

The Ute judgment for $3,305,257.19 is carried in the bill. The matter was debated at some length in the House, and by arrangement $100,000 was carried in the Indian appropriation bill in order to enable the annuities that were otherwise due, to be paid, so that between now and the next session of Congress a more thorough investigation might be made to determine what should be done in reference to that judgment. The Attorney General has sent to a number of the Members of the House a very comprehensive paper in reply to the debate which took place in the House. Those who are required to make the investigation have not had time to digest the opinion of the Attorney General or the reasons he urges for the payment of the judgment and which he gives for the failure of the Department of Justice to take an appeal.

One other matter relates to Camp Schofield, in the Hawaiian Islands—the so-called water matter. It may be in the adjustment of the differences between the two Houses that if the Senate persists in its disagreement to this item, even though it be legislation of a most beneficial character, the House may be compelled to recede. But with that exception, Mr. Speaker, the managers on the part of the House have notified the Senate conferees that they are prepared to go back to the conference and permit the Senate conferees to recede on all of the other amendments; and if they are unwilling to do so, so far as the House conferees are concerned, this general deficiency bill can fail. [Applause.] We will be ready to report to the House either that the Senate has receded or that it declines to permit this bill to become a law, and that in either case there is no further necessity for Congress to remain in session. If this House is to permit, in the closing hours of the session, another body to hold it up and to coerce it into granting appropriations for all sorts of things that do not belong upon these bills in order to get the necessary money to pay the current obligations, or judgments, or certified claims of the Government, then the House might just as well abandon its contention that it has some control over the purse of the people. [Applause.]

So far as I am concerned, as this is the first session in which a Democratic House in 16 years has had charge of these appropriations, and since the managers on the part of the House have given up upon every item upon which a legitimate argument could be made or a showing could be made which would justify the yielding upon the part of the House, I am prepared, and my associates on the conference committee are prepared, to let the responsibility for the failure of this deficiency bill rest with the Senate. If it does not wish to recede from these items, then let the country know the facts, and next session arrangements can be made for the deficiencies necessary to take care of those obligations incurred during the past year or two which properly belong in this deficiency bill. [Applause.]

I ask for a vote.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CANNON. I do not wish very much time. Possibly about five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I agree substantially with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has stated. There ought to be no trouble, following the well-known rules that have existed, when insisted upon by either the House or the Senate, in settling differences upon general supply bills. This is a bill to provide for deficiencies in the past fiscal year. When matters of legislation, placed upon general supply bills, are in dispute between the House and the Senate, the body which initiates those matters of legislation must, under the general practice, recede.

There are two or three matters of minor importance here that, as one conferee, I would be willing to vote to recede upon. But substantially I agree with the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

Claims under the rules of the House and Senate—so far as they have rules—are to be treated as claims, and are not to be fastened upon general appropriation bills. In theory and substantially in practice, except by unanimous consent, legislation does not go upon general-supply bills. Under that theory and practice, if the House insisted, it would cause the Senate to recede from the Stone claim.

As to the Charlotte public-building item, if it were a matter of legislation pending by itself I would vote for it. The Virginia and Maryland claims, if objected to by the House, would, of course, be receded from by the Senate, otherwise the action of the Senate would not be justified under the practice between the two bodies. The same would be true with respect to the Texas and Oregon claims. The Valdez item is not authorized by law.

There is an item of $250 for increase of pay to the Second Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It has no place upon this bill. It is prospective and not retrospective, and is not justified by law.

Amendment No. 62, as the gentleman from New York has said, is a proposition legislatively to create a board of public works. It goes without saying that on that item, the House objecting, the Senate should recede.

As to the extra month's pay for employees of the House and Senate, if it stood by itself, considering the long session that we have had, if my vote could carry it and if the Democratic caucus had not spoken—which, however, does not bind me—in equity and propriety I would approve it, although it should be said that it is not authorized by law but has frequently been authorized in practice by both parties when in power from time to time on this side and on the other side.

As to the Ute judgment, I apprehend that there would be no difficulty in agreeing to it. It ought to be done. It is a judgment of the Court of Claims. Still, there are conditions surrounding it upon which opposition is based. But having already appropriated $100,000 for the Indian appropriation bill, that would justify us in postponing it for future consideration; although upon further inquiry during the conference it appeared that in justice to these Indians, in order to meet claims arising from their necessities, I would be willing to appropriate something further.

As to the Camp Schofield or Hawaiian water question, that is legislation proposed by the House. I believe it is wise legislation, but if the Senate does not agree to it, under the rules obtaining the House ought to recede.

That is all I desire to say touching this conference report. I do not believe this bill ought to fail. It cares for the public service provided for by law; it pays judgments of the Court of Claims; it pays audited accounts; it pays that which we are bound under the law to pay. As we passed it in the House it carried something like $6,000,000, if I recollect aright, and we are ready to concede the larger part of the Senate amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not the larger part?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the larger part in amounts.

Mr. CARLIN. That would be the Ute Indian claim?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would exclude the Ute Indian claim.

I am hopeful that when the conferees of the House and Senate again meet both sets of conferees, representing the House and the Senate, will agree to settle the differences which the gentleman from New York has referred to substantially under the terms that from time almost immemorial have obtained in settling differences between the House and Senate upon general supply bills. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House except for the purpose of stating to the House that I indorse all that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has said in reference to this bill. I want to state, also, that in the main I agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says. The three conferees on the part of the House have labored earnestly from 10 o'clock this morning up to about 7 this evening in endeavoring to reach an agreement.

As has been stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the House conferees have yielded upon every item that was possible for us to feel that it was our duty to yield upon, and every single item that was properly in a deficiency bill we have yielded on without a single exception; but matters that do not belong in a deficiency bill we did not feel called upon to yield upon, and we have presented our action to the House for its approval. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. CANNON.

THE SPEAKER.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, we are about to adjourn after a long session—nine months in duration. This session has been a busy and important one; and, outside of the unsuccessful attempt at tariff tinkering, it has accomplished much for the good of our common country. The important and useful legislation enacted has been passed with the votes of Republicans and Democrats alike.

In all our labors, stretching over nine long months, the Speaker of this House has made a splendid record as our presiding officer. [Applause.] He has been patient, just, and impartial. From his rulings and in all his official acts no one could tell his politics. [Applause.]

In behalf of myself and every Member on this side of the House I wish to express our high opinion of him as a man and as our presiding officer, and to wish him an enjoyable and well-earned vacation, and a return to us next winter in good health [applause]; and that by and by, when this country decides that a Democratic President should be chosen to preside over its destinies, that honor will be conferred upon him. [Great applause.]

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 10.30 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 10 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed its session.

PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] be given 10 minutes, or as much thereof as he cares to consume, in informing the House why the Amazon was not called the Tombigbee and the Tombigbee the Amazon. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] have 10 minutes or as much thereof as he desires in which to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMAZON AND TOMBIGBEE RIVERS.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to express my thanks and appreciation to my genial friend from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] for asking unanimous consent for me to address the House, and also to the House for the good will shown toward me in granting the request. I had no intention of making a speech at this time, and I must confess that my good friend took me by surprise in submitting his request; but, nevertheless, nothing gives me greater pleasure at any time than to have an opportunity to present the importance of the improvement of the Tombigbee River, a project which every Member of this House knows is near to my heart and the consummation of which I most earnestly desire.

This river has been improved by locks and dams from its mouth up to Demopolis, Ala., and what I am especially urging at this time is the extension of this improvement by the same system of locks and dams from Demopolis on up the river to Columbus, Miss. I am happy to say that in the rivers and harbors bill passed at this session of Congress I succeeded in securing authority to make a survey of the section of the river from Demopolis to Columbus, together with estimates of the improvement necessary to furnish all the year around navigation. I feel absolutely confident that when the report is made by the War Department it will be favorable, and that I shall be made supremely happy by having you all join with me in voting for an appropriation for the permanent improvement of this beautiful river. [Applause.]

Along the banks of the river are inexhaustible deposits of cement, and the virgin forests grow in grandeur and luxuriance, and the fertile soil produces in great quantities the white fleecy staple and the waving corn, the alfalfa, and all varieties of crops.

The commerce, present and prospective, is abundantly sufficient to furnish plenty of freight to be transported by the steamboats, which will promptly enter the trade as soon as assurance can be given that they can safely navigate this river during all the year.

I want you all to join me in accomplishing this great improvement for another reason, and that is, I am assured by my big-hearted and generous constituents that when this river is improved and opened to navigation they propose to construct a great vessel to immediately engage in this trade, and they intend to name it "Tombigbee Zeke Candler." [Applause.] When it makes its first trip I am to be permitted to invite all my friends to join me, and it will afford me great pleasure then to extend an invitation to each and all of you on both sides of this Chamber—because I am happy in the thought that all of you, regardless of political affiliations, are my personal friends—to join me and my constituents on this great and memorable trip, and I am sure that we all will get out of it supreme happiness and pleasure as we shall plow the silvery waves of the Tombigbee from the Queen City of Columbus to the Mexican Gulf. [Great applause.] So, get ready to help me to secure the appropriation for this improvement, and then be ready to join me on this most pleasant voyage.

So much for the Tombigbee at this time, but you will hear from me further about it later, when I secure that favorable report from the War Department.

Permit me now to address myself for a few moments in another direction. I was very much delighted and entertained this afternoon as our distinguished Speaker stood upon this floor and I heard him tell about the achievements of the Democratic Party during this session of Congress. The truth of it is we have made a great record and one that is in the interest of the people, for the advancement of prosperity, the glory of the flag, and for the development of the Republic. It affords me the greatest pleasure to say that this has been accomplished under the superb and splendid leadership of our great Speaker [Mr. CLARK] and magnificent floor leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. [Applause.] To their wise counsel and almost unerring leadership all of us on this side of the House owe much. I believe the record will sustain me in saying that I was the first, or among the first, in a speech on the floor of this House to suggest the election of Mr. CLARK for Speaker. I then said in substance that he would make a great Speaker and would measure up to the standard established during the administrations of his predecessors. I believe that every Member of this House, regardless of politics, will testify now that all I said has been fully and completely verified. [Applause.]

Under the present leadership in the House we are gratified to see a united party and one that has stood together during all this long session of Congress and defined the issues and presented them to the country upon which victory seems certain. When we look back upon the achievements of the grand old party in the past, its successes of the present, and its possibilities for the future, we rejoice and press onward.

We are indeed made happy when we look out all over the country and further see the unanimity that exists in the party, as we see the people rallying beneath its flag, with Woodrow Wilson at the head of the column, all pressing on shoulder to shoulder, with hearts beating in unity, to the great victory that awaits us in November. May it come with all its blessings, and in the great victory may we not only be successful in putting Mr. Wilson in the White House and Mr. Marshall as Vice President to preside over the Senate, but I sincerely hope and trust we shall have a great majority in this House and secure control of the Senate.

If we do succeed in this, and I honestly and sincerely believe we will, we will give to the country a plain old-fashioned Democratic administration of affairs, which will perpetuate in office the Democratic Party for the good of all the people and the glory of this great Republic. [Applause.]

In conclusion, permit me again to thank my good friend from New Jersey and the House for giving me this opportunity in the closing hours of this session to speak a word in favor of the improvement of the Tombigbee and in the interest of the Democratic Party. [Loud applause.]

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he has heard anything more from the conference?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have telephoned to the Senate, and I understand the managers on the part of the House and Senate are still in conference, but they will probably reach a conclusion in a very few minutes, and I hope the House will wait, because if they can not agree on the bill to-night it seems it would be impossible for them to agree on it at all. I understand the President is at the Senate awaiting the action of the House, and it is my purpose to offer a resolution for final adjournment if the conferees can not agree.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to stay, so far as I am concerned. I do not think it is right that those who are required to stay should be inflicted in addition by the getting off of very old and stale political speeches.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the general deficiency bill, and ask that the statement accompanying it may be read instead of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] presents a conference report on the general deficiency bill and asks that the accompanying statement be read instead of the report. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1254).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the word "Kansas" in the last line of said amendment insert the following: "payable out of any money in the Treasury belonging to the Pottawatomie Indians"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the end of the matter inserted by said amendment the following: ", and at a rate per square foot of available floor space not exceeding 40 cents"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 5 and 6 of said amendment, strike out the following: "to continue available during the fiscal year 1913"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114, the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
THOMAS U. SISSON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
JONATHAN BOURNE, JR.,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The bill, so far as agreed upon, appropriates $7,243,474.69, being $1,058,232.45 in excess of the amount it carried as passed by the House.

The Senate added to the bill, by amendment, $5,515,607.15.

It has been agreed by the conference committee that the Senate recede from $3,854,134.65 of that amount and that the House agree to the amount of $1,058,236.45.

The amendments remaining in dispute involve $603,236.41, as follows:

Payment to Virginia and Maryland	$192,000.00
Payment to State of Texas	217,693.30
Payment to Oregon	193,543.02

The committee of conference have also been unable to agree on the amendment of the Senate to pay an additional month's salary to the officers and employees of Congress.

Chief among the amounts added by the Senate and recommended to be agreed to are additional audited accounts transmitted by the Treasury Department after the passage of the bill by the House and for judgments of courts against the United States.

Among the items inserted by the Senate from which it is recommended that body recede are the following:

Eradication of the opium evil, $25,000;

Payment to Malambo fire claimants, $53,800;

Payment of the sums contributed for the release of Miss Ellen M. Stone, $66,000;

Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, $50,000;

Protection of property and buildings of the United States at Valdez, Alaska, $55,000;

Contingent expenses Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, $25,000;

For payment of a judgment in favor of the Confederated Band of Ute Indians, $3,305,257.19; and

The provision establishing a bureau of public buildings.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
T. U. SISSON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, since the last report was made to the House by the managers on the part of the House, a conference has been had upon the 14 Senate amendments in disagreement.

The House receded upon the legislative provision relative to Camp Schofield, in the Hawaiian Islands.

The Senate receded from an item to pay those who advanced money for the ransom of Ellen M. Stone; from a legislative provision for the Charlotte public building; an item for the payment to Thomas W. and Alice N. Kellar of an amount which it is claimed should have been awarded in condemnation proceedings for property taken in the District of Columbia; the item to protect Valdez, Alaska, against glacial floods; the item providing a bureau of public works; the item increasing the compensation fixed in the legislative bill for the Second Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs; an item relating to the Montana National Bison Range, and the Ute judgment.

The bill as it passed the Senate carried $11,700,845.75. As it passed the House it carried $6,185,238.24. The Senate has receded from $3,854,134.65, of which $3,305,000 is the so-called Ute judgment.

The House has receded from items aggregating $1,058,236.45.

The amendments still remaining in dispute involve $603,236, and whatever money additional would be required to pay an extra month's compensation to the employees of both Houses.

Exclusive of the items in dispute, the bill carries, to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the public service, $7,243,474.69.

The managers on the part of the Senate insist that, as a condition for the appropriation of these necessary moneys, the House shall concede the payment of these so-called State claims aggregating $603,236.45.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible at this time to go into a lengthy discussion of these so-called State claims. They are not audited claims. They are not judgments which are certified by the Treasury Department for payment. Some of them originated in 1790 and have been in Congress since that time. Others originated before the Civil War, and some during the Civil War. In the closing days of this long session of Congress the Senate has placed them upon this supply bill and insists that these claims be paid, without opportunity for investigation and determination, as a condition for the passage of this bill. If the House is to submit to such a condition of affairs——

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Then it will be forever at the mercy of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. To whom will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if any irreparable harm would be done to the public service if this bill should fail? If no such irreparable harm should come about, I think that would be a very happy solution of the trouble.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. CANNON. I would suggest to the gentleman that he ask the House to adopt the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall do that, and ask that the conference report be first adopted.

Mr. CARLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman what effect this would have upon the other items?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not affect them.

Mr. CARLIN. The adoption of the conference report does not affect the other items?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This report must either be adopted or rejected; and if it be rejected we will never get to the items in disagreement.

Mr. LEVER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that one of the items in dispute is the matter of an extra month's pay for Senate and House employees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it is.

Mr. CARLIN. Does not this report recommend that we disagree to these items?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are reported in disagreement. After the report is disposed of, I shall submit a motion as to those items.

Mr. MANN. The report does not affect those items at all.

Mr. CARLIN. That is what I want to understand.

Mr. MANN. A motion to concur will be in order after the report is adopted.

Mr. CARLIN. That is what I want to be certain about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I did not understand the gentleman fully about amendment numbered 73, with reference to the national bison range.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate receded from that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Of course that makes it a part of the conference report. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is it not a fact that in 1906 the general deficiency bill carried an appropriation for $375,000 to reimburse the State of Texas for money expended, just as this item in this general deficiency bill is intended to reimburse the State of Texas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman explain to me the difference between the general deficiency bill in that year, carrying that item of $375,000, and the general deficiency bill in this year, carrying an item of $217,000, found by the Secretary of War, in a report that has been sent to Congress under its direction, to be due the State of Texas. What is the difference in principle between the two?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not quite familiar with the deficiency bill of 1906. I was not on the conference committee, but I will state what happened. In 1905 the Secretary of War was directed by Congress to inquire and report to Congress for its consideration what sum or sums of money were actually expended by the State of Texas during the period of time between February 28, 1855, and June 28, 1860, in payment of State volunteers or rangers called into service by the State of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredators, for which compensation had not been made from the Treasury of the United States. A report was made in accordance with that, and Congress, after receiving that report, appropriated $375,000.

Subsequently an additional report was submitted, and if I recall correctly, $22,000 was appropriated.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. During this session of Congress another report was submitted, which I have not had an opportunity to examine carefully, but from which it appears that one of four sums may be due the State of Texas—$25,993.75 if one view be taken, $170,270.58 if another view be taken, $198,628.80 if a third view be taken, or $217,693.39 if a fourth view be taken.

The Senate amendment carries the largest of the four sums that Congress might determine is due the State.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have the report in my hand as made by the Secretary of War in this year 1912, and under the direction of Congress he finds that in the proper view, if you will read the report carefully, the State of Texas is entitled to $217,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That depends on which view you take.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that is the proper view, after reading this report—that that amount is due the State of Texas. It is inserted in this deficiency appropriation bill just as it was in 1906. I can see no difference in principle.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this item does not belong in this bill. The only character of claims that belongs in this bill are claims to pay judgments of courts certified for payment or audited claims certified for payment. If this claim has any standing in Congress, it should go to the Committee on Claims for consideration by that committee. It is impossible for those representing the House to determine whether the State should have this money, which is placed here in the very dying hours of this Congress, and which is made a condition by the managers on the part of the Senate for the passage of this supply bill. It is tied up to the claims of three other States, one of them the State of Oregon, which claim I recall having examined some three or four years ago and of having some very grave doubts as to its validity.

My attention has never been called to it since. I am asked to agree to an item appropriating $193,000 to pay that claim. The Texas claim and the Oregon claim when offered as amendments to appropriation bills in the House were held not to be in order, because they were neither judgments certified by the Treasury Department nor audited claims certified by the Treasury Department and therefore they belonged to that great mass of claims similar to claims reported under resolutions adopted under the Tucker Act and sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Was not one of these claims adjudicated by the Court of Claims?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not in the sense that it is a judgment binding on the Government, nor in the same way that Congress sends a lot of claims to the Court of Claims for a report for action by Congress, but such claims are never placed on an appropriation bill. They go either to the Committee on Claims or to the Committee on War Claims. That is the status of the Oregon claims.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But if it is due, it has to be paid some time by the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All of the claims reported upon by the Court of Claims are not considered either as due or valid claims by Congress, and there are not only hundreds of thousands, but millions of reports from the Court of Claims which Congress has declined to grant for a great many years.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from New York to move a further disagreement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is my purpose to ask the House to adhere to its disagreement to these Senate amendments and place upon the Senate the responsibility for the failure of this bill, if it makes a condition that these items must be allowed. [Applause.] We have provided here every dollar that legitimately belongs upon this bill, and I do not believe that in the dying hours of the Congress this House should permit itself to be held up by anybody and compelled to vote $603,000 to settle claims running back to 1790——

Mr. CARLIN. I did not expect to provoke a speech. I was trying to get at the parliamentary status.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Placed on this bill without an opportunity for those charged with responsibility by the House to make a recommendation as to their validity. Gentlemen in this House who serve on conferences representing the House on these appropriation bills have as difficult tasks as can be assigned to anyone, to inquire into the things that may legitimately be placed upon these bills, without being asked in a couple of hours to digest half a dozen volumes of the size of the one I hold in my hand, to form a judgment as to the propriety of these claims. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate of the United States, when this question is placed before them, will dare assume the responsibility for permitting this supply bill to fail, if it fails to coerce the House; and if it wishes to assume that responsibility I am willing that it should, and I am willing to go before the country upon that issue. [Applause.]

We have been hearing much in this session of Congress about the House putting things in appropriation bills that do not belong there. Every item placed in appropriation bills by the House—in the Army, in the legislative, and in the sundry civil appropriation bills—was designed to protect the Treasury against wasteful, extortionate expenditures; and now many of those who joined in the clamor against the House for attempting to legislate in such a way to protect the Public Treasury are insisting that the House shall consent that legislation be incorporated in these bills as a condition to their passage, when that legislation does not belong in them and is legislation that is destined to take great sums out of the Treasury.

I have no desire to detain the House any longer. The issue is quite clear, and, so that the House may send to the Senate its decision in this matter, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adhere to its disagreement to Senate amendments numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114. They include the State claims of Virginia, Maryland, and Texas, the extra month's pay to the employees of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Chair puts the motion. The gentleman from New York moves that the House adhere to its disagreement to Senate amendments numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CARLIN. Does not a motion to agree take precedence over a motion to disagree?

The SPEAKER. A motion to concur always takes precedence.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to be heard for just a few moments.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman intend to make the motion to concur?

Mr. CARLIN. I expect to do so, but I want to make an explanation before I offer it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CARLIN. About five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I realize that there is much force in the position taken by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations regarding legislation upon appropriation bills. There is much force in the position that we should resist the attitude of the Senate in regard to that character of legislation, but there would be much more force if it were not true that every appropriation bill that has been reported to this House by the gentleman and his committee and the conferees carried with it and upon it legislation and matters which did not properly belong upon the bill. [Applause.] There was not one single bill that this Appropriations Committee has reported, so far as I can recall, that some item would not be found upon it that did not belong in the bill. Why, only the other night the Speaker intimated that he would hold that items reported from a conference committee—not this Appropriations Committee, however—had no place upon the bill. The conferees reported foreign matter and the Speaker, under the rules of the House, would have had to rule that they had no right there and had no right to be upon it.

The power of the Rules Committee was invoked to make in order upon that bill a provision which violates the rules of this House. What sanctity is there in this particular piece of paper upon which this bill is written? Why not write upon this bill by amendments as well as upon any other appropriation bill? From whence comes the great sanctity of this particular bill, that the Representatives in the American Congress are denied the right, if they care to, to write upon it and through it and by it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Virginia tell us why these claims in which he is interested should be allowed?

Mr. CARLIN. I am coming to that. There are two objections. One is that this is not the method of legislation. So far as the claim I am interested in is concerned, I have heard no criticism of it by the gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee, and I do not feel called upon, therefore, to go into an explanation of it. He has not attacked the Virginia claim, and I am not going to weary this House with that, except by a few cursory remarks.

I want to say, however, these claims are not the claims of single individuals. These claims which are in dispute are claims of sovereign States of this Union. Has the time come when in the Congress of the United States four sovereign States of the Union shall be denied the right to have a claim against its own Government considered because it happens to find itself there upon a piece of parchment that bore a title which perhaps it ought not to bear? I would be willing, were it not for this late hour, to thrash out in this House the merits of the claim for which I desire an appropriation. In brief, my friends, the patriotic State of Virginia when Washington was to be located as the seat of Government here advanced by its act of legislature this money in the amount of $120,000 for the purpose of constructing public buildings. In the original act of the legislature the word "donate" was used, and Chief Justice Marshall, then a member of the Legislature of Virginia, moved to strike out that word and insert the word "advance," and the only question left to talk about is whether the word "advance" meant a gift or a loan. Up to 1836 there was not a dollar in the Treasury of the United States with which to pay a single State——

Mr. MANN. A Democratic administration.

Mr. CARLIN. True, but there were all sorts of administrations. But when a surplus appeared, Virginia and Maryland both—Maryland in the sum of $72,000—asked for the payment of this money.

And from that day to this they have appeared and asked for this advance to be returned, until now you say: "You have been asking so long that the claim has grown old, and its very age entitles it to be thrown into the wastebasket."

You pass it through the Senate one year and the House the next year, but it never gets through the two Houses at the same session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, what are the facts? Virginia does not ask for the return of this money now. The old patriotic State has said to the Congress of the United States, "Turn this money over to a patriotic association to be known as the Mount Vernon Avenue Association," and when you do it that association is hereby authorized to build a highway from the Capital City of the Nation that bears his name to Mount Vernon, where rest the remains of the immortal Washington. [Applause.]

That is the claim we are told can not be considered, because the Senate wants to choke it down the throat of somebody. I wish, my countrymen, they would choke more such claims as that down our throats, because if it is an honest debt it ought to be paid. The question of time does not run between sovereigns. That is no question of legislation. No one has ever contended that the money has ever been returned; no one has contended that a single dollar has ever been paid. Is there a man who will raise his voice and say that one cent of that money has been paid to Maryland and Virginia? Why not pay it, especially, my countrymen, when it is to be paid for the patriotic purpose which I have named, the building of that great highway for the use of the whole American people?

I would move to concur were it not for the fact that I do not believe that this House will single one claim from many others. I do not believe that this Congress at this late hour would consider the further merits of this matter. And so I am willing for it to continue in disagreement, with the hope that, at least, the Senate conferees will be able to have my good brothers on the House side conclude, at least, that the claims of Maryland and Virginia ought to be paid. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it seems indeed a little harsh that the gentleman from New York, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, would make a statement to the effect that the Senate of the United States is endeavoring to hold up this House in order to procure the payment of these claims. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that in the gentleman's statement he has reflected on a State which I have the honor to in part represent on the floor of this House. I can not believe that the distinguished Senator from Texas, who is a member of the conference committee on the part of the Senate, who for four years was a distinguished attorney general of his State, four years the chief executive of that State, and three times elected to the Senate of the United States, is endeavoring to hold up the House of Representatives or the Government of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman understands that I intended no reflection on the Senator.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand that the gentleman intends no reflection on him. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has stated his side of this question. I realize that in the closing hours of this session of Congress it is not possible to debate the merits of this controversy, but has the Senator from Texas endeavored to do anything strange or unusual by inserting the claim of Texas for $217,000 in this general deficiency bill? Let us for a moment argue it and see.

In 1905 the Congress of the United States directed by explicit language that the Secretary of War make an investigation to ascertain whether or not the United States Government owed the State of Texas any sum for sending troops to the frontier of that State and defending not only Texas, but this whole country against bands of Mexican marauders and Indians on the outposts of our country. Old Sam Houston, a native of the State of Virginia, who had gone to the State of Texas to cast his fortunes with that great empire, sent the troops of that State to the frontier to repel invasion of foreign foes not only against the State of Texas, but against this entire country. An investigation was made by the Secretary of War, and he reported that the United States Government owed and should pay to the State of Texas the money that was expended for the defense of the frontier of our State and this entire country.

And in 1906, in pursuance of that investigation and report by the Secretary of War to the Congress of the United States, this body inserted in a general deficiency bill such an item as we are now considering—the sum of $375,000 as a part payment to the State of Texas. And afterwards, upon further investigation, additional testimony was found showing that the State of Texas had not been entirely reimbursed, and another sum of $21,000 was paid to the State. And, again, upon a further and more searching investigation, it was ascertained that there is still due the State of Texas $217,000; and now——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, the Senate of the United States has inserted in this bill, as has been inserted in general deficiency bills before, an appropriation of $217,000. Mr. Speaker, I shall not endeavor to argue the merits of that sum, but I am willing to stand upon the statement of the distinguished Senator from Texas, a painstaking legislator, and take his word for it that the amount is due the State of Texas, because I know that he would not claim anything from this Government which is not justly due to the State which he represents in the United States Senate.

Oh, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says that a deficiency bill is not the place on which to legislate; that it is a bill made up of claims not in the same class with this claim. Why, Mr. Speaker, well do you remember that the gentleman's committee came to the Committee on Rules and asked that committee to make in order a proposition in regard to Schofield Barracks in the Hawaiian Islands, so that a point of order could not be made against it, to the end that they might legislate on the deficiency bill. Why, the gentleman has been declaiming eloquently here in the last few days concerning the great legislative triumphs which have been brought about in England and in this country by placing upon supply bills meritorious matters of legislation, pointing out that some of the greatest legislative triumphs both in England and in this country have been won in that way.

Why, this Congress can put legislation in supply bills if it desires. I am not one of those who would exclude entirely the Senate of the United States from participation in the making up of appropriation bills of this Government. While I recognize that the House is supposed to hold the purse strings of the Nation, yet the money bills must go to the Senate of the United States, a coordinate branch of this Government; and when painstaking legislators there have made investigation and state that they arrive at certain conclusions, I am willing to take the word of some of them, even though they do represent their States in another branch of this Government. There is nothing strange or unusual about it.

Now, whether this bill should fail or not, I am not prepared to say to-night, but in behalf of my State, in the closing hours of this session, I wish to repel the accusation that the State of Texas is endeavoring to hold up the House of Representatives, or that the distinguished Senator from Texas is asking that any unusual thing shall be done in inserting this item in an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to yield to me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak briefly on the Oregon claim. First, I wish to say that it has been the practice of the House for a long period of years to pay claims like this on a deficiency bill. Some years ago I looked up the matter, and I found that on 21 deficiency bills a large number of these claims of the States which had rendered assistance to the Government in the Civil War had been paid, and it is not unusual and it is not an innovation to offer these amendments to the general deficiency bill at this time.

The Oregon claim arose in this way: At the beginning of the Civil War the Government of the United States withdrew its troops from the Northwest Territory and left the mail trains, the emigrant trains to the Northwest, and the people of the Northwest open to the attacks of Indians. Unable to provide for our protection, the Government appealed to the State of Oregon, then the only State on the northwest Pacific coast, to provide protection for her own citizens against Indians, to provide for the protection of emigrants coming across the country to the Northwest, and to provide for the safety of the mails of the United States.

The government of the State of Oregon, which at that time was not rich in money and did not have a great amount of property to tax, pledged its future revenues for the protection of the Government's mails, for the protection of the people of the United States who were coming to the Northwest, and for the protection of her own people; and the troops so raised actually fought the Indians in Oregon, Washington, northern California, and Idaho in the protection of the Government's property, the Government's mails, and the settlers who were crossing the country. The State issued bonds to secure the necessary funds. We have paid the bonds. The debt was incurred at the direct request of the Government of the United States, with the understanding that when the Government was able it should repay the money.

Some years ago the State of Oregon, in order to be sure of the justice of its claim, and that it might be a case proven, caused a suit to be instituted in the Court of Claims, and under the direction of her attorney general prosecuted the suit and obtained from the Court of Claims a favorable finding of facts.

The Court of Claims in a long opinion concluded that under the request of the Government of the United States the State of Oregon had raised troops, paid them their compensation, subsisted them, and had done everything that was necessary to raise troops, to equip them, and maintain them in the field for effective service in aid of the United States. The court found that the State of Oregon was entitled to $193,543.02.

In 1910, in conference with the then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I presented an amendment which is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 16, 1910, and which was agreed to by the House in order that the finding of facts made by the Court of Claims might be submitted to the Treasury Department for investigation and for audit as to its amounts, to see whether any amount of this had been paid, whether the work had been done as it was stated to have been done; and the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of January 5, 1911, reported to the Committee on Appropriations the facts that I have just stated.

Now, we have proceeded as far as we can. We have established the facts of the service beyond dispute. We have established the fact that the money is yet due and legitimately owing to the State of Oregon, and that we were promised repayment.

We have established these things in the Court of Claims and by an examination made by the Treasury Department under a special item in one of the appropriation bills in 1910. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was slightly in error a moment ago when he stated that it was some three or four years ago that an amendment was offered to pay this claim. I offered it in 1911, and he himself made the point of order against the item.

We have prosecuted the claim with all diligence. At the request of the Government we protected the people of the country in the Northwest. We fought wars in four States against the Indians. We protected the mails, we did everything that we were asked to do; and some 15 or 20 other States, under practically the same conditions, have had paid to them many millions of money for similar services.

Our claim does not cover quite half of all that we expended. The Court of Claims only found about half the amount that we claimed, and we are asking only for the amount found by the Court of Claims after exhaustive and careful hearing, after examination of all the records, and proof of our statements verified by the Secretary of the Treasury, and we appeal to this body that this is a just claim that ought to be paid. I have never been able to understand why this claim has not been paid promptly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like an opportunity to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon one minute.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I should like to know what other States have had their claims paid through deficiency bills like this?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think almost all the Northern States have been so paid. I made a very careful examination some years ago, and found that in 21 deficiency bills, either urgent or general, some 30 claims similar to this claim were paid.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Mississippi require?

Mr. SISSON. Five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Mississippi may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. It is not my purpose at this time to do otherwise than to state the reasons which prompted the House conferees in not agreeing to these amendments, in addition to what the gentleman from New York has said in reference to the propriety of their being on a deficiency bill. I did not have an opportunity to investigate the Oregon claim, and I state frankly that my information about the Oregon claim is very meager, but I did make some investigation of the Virginia claim and looked into the Texas claim a little. The claim of Virginia is in reference to the $120,000 advanced by the State of Virginia to the Federal Government in the erection of the buildings in the District of Columbia. The State of Maryland advanced $72,000 for that purpose. Whether this is the truth about the matter or not I am unwilling to state now, but it is contended that that $120,000 and the $72,000 was advanced with the understanding that the Capital of the United States should be located on the Potomac River, either in the State of Virginia or in the State of Maryland.

I have not time to go into the action of the commissioners, but shortly after this first advance was made Gen. Washington made a statement to the Assembly of Virginia and to the governor of Virginia that the $120,000 was not enough to erect the buildings in Washington and there was no money in the Federal Treasury. The State of Virginia, upon the indorsement of the commissioners, advanced to the Federal Government, first, $100,000, and shortly after that advanced, my recollection is, a second $100,000. Then the State of Virginia received payment in full for the two loans, and it was all paid, my recollection is, in 1808. The peculiar circumstance is that if this $120,000 now in controversy was an advance by the State of Virginia and in the nature of a loan, why is it that they did not pay the $120,000 when they paid the $200,000 borrowed? It looks as if that was considered at the time as a donation by the State of Virginia for the location of the Capital here in Washington.

I have not made an investigation of the original records, and I would not prejudice the claim of the gentleman from the State of Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] if he has a valid claim, but the limited time in which we have to make these investigations upon these items placed by the Senate in a deficiency bill would not warrant us in asking this House to pay the $120,000 at this late date.

So far as the Texas claims are concerned, they originated during several years. Under the old law the State militia of the States was relied upon by the States more absolutely than now. This claim arises from services rendered by the State of Texas soon after she was admitted into the Union. It does not appear, so far as I can find in the record, that the President of the United States ever requested the governor of Texas to perform this service for the Government. It seems to have been, so far as the record shows and so far as my investigation has permitted me to go, a voluntary service by the governor and the State of Texas for the protection of her own people and the protection of her own property.

I do not believe, if that is true, that the governor of Texas and the State of Texas, acting through the State military authorities, can directly or indirectly bind the Federal Government. So far as the investigation by the Secretary of War is concerned, it does not state this amount is due from the United States Government to the State of Texas. On the contrary, the resolution provided that the War Department should make an investigation of the amount of money which the State of Texas paid her rangers in protecting her borders and report back to Congress, and that is the only thing that the resolution does. It does not in any sense of the word bind Congress to pay it. It is not in any sense of the word an adjudicated claim. The only recommendation made under that resolution is that an investigation be made and ascertain what the State of Texas expended in the protection of her borders.

The Secretary simply complied with the resolution, and he leaves it absolutely with Congress to determine whether a legal liability exists, and if a legal claim against the Federal Government does exist the Committee on Claims ought to handle it and ascertain the amount due; and if Congress decides we ought to pay it, it might properly come in the deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the Schofield Barracks, the reason the Committee on Appropriations asked for this matter is because $50,000 of the water of the Government was being used by a company, and if we could not put this legislation on this deficiency bill at this time, as a point of order was made against it in the sundry civil bill, it meant that the Federal Government would lose $50,000, so we protected the Treasury to that extent.

But the conferees on the part of the House, recognizing the universal rule, recognizing that the Senate had the right not to have legislation on an appropriation bill, receded, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has been long a Member of this House, states that it has been the practice observed in the House and in the Senate that when legislation is placed upon an appropriation bill by one House and the other House objects to it, the House placing the legislation on the bill must recede, rather than to let the bill fail. These are the motives that moved us in not reporting these claims. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, it seems that as to these three State claims, Oregon has made out the best case of any of the three. In fact, the case that is made out by my very able colleague for the State of Oregon is conclusive and unanswerable [applause], the record showing that the military of the State was called into being and into action upon the request of the President. That the State bonded its own resources with which to perform this military service while the Regular troops were withdrawn from the Northwest makes it clear and absolute and gave an obligation upon the part of the United States to repay this money. The matter has, by proper resolution, been referred to the Court of Claims, has been finally adjudicated in favor of Oregon to the extent of only about one-half of her claim, and upon another resolution put through by my colleague the Secretary of the Treasury has reported that no part of these claims held to be due by the Court of Claims has been paid and has certified to the Committee on Appropriations the exact amount that is now included in these claims. For that reason, if no other gentleman moves to concur in amendment No. 34 I shall do so.

Now, just a word in regard to the parliamentary status of the bill and the amendment. I regret exceedingly that the distinguished gentleman from New York has taken the attitude that the three conferees from the other body have taken the position of coercion and insist that these three State claims be allowed or that the bill fail. I understand that those three conferees from the other end of the Capitol have merely stated that they will decline to recede from the Senate amendments. If the Senate should direct them to recede, of course they will recede. As conferees they have declined to recede. I see no coercion or demand for coercion in that action. If the House should now vote to adhere to its disagreement to all three of these amendments, it would only be binding until another report should come in. If the Senate directs its three conferees to adhere to their position, why, I do not see how either the House or Senate conferees could recede, but I do not think that either of the conferees should accuse the other of any attempt at coercion in the matter of these bills. I do not favor any statement of repudiation of debts due by this Nation. I say that the United States Government should pay its debts when they are due and proper to be paid the same as the individual should pay his debts. This smacks of repudiation when a bill like the Oregon bill has been allowed by a tribunal of the United States, not a tribunal of Oregon, and certified and audited by the Treasurer of the United States and by the Secretary of War, and it is shown that just such debts as these have been paid 20 or 30 times upon deficiency bills. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in Senate amendment numbered 34. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will try to get through in five minutes. I say to the House we have divided our jurisdiction; we have Committees on Claims, Military Affairs, Judiciary, Appropriations, and so forth. The jurisdiction of the House and the Senate, for that matter, is fixed by the rules. Now, gentlemen say that there is a report from the Secretary of the Treasury about the Texas claim, and the case was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the Congress. Why? For appropriation? No; for consideration. Now, gentlemen from the South, perhaps more than we from the North, understand about the Tucker Act. Why, there are hundreds, aye, thousands, of claims on resolutions of the House or Senate that have been referred to the Court of Claims. Why? To make findings and report to Congress for its consideration. They go to the Committee on Claims or War Claims.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question? I will not interrupt him but a minute. What is the value of the Court of Claims if, after getting a report from that, you put it in a pigeonhole and it is never acted on? Why not abolish the court?

Mr. CANNON. Why abolish the court? You can abolish it if you pass the law, but gentlemen understand about these omnibus claims bills. Every one of them substantially provides for findings of the Court of Claims. It is submitted to the Court of Claims. Why? To report and not render judgment, but for the consideration of Congress. So it was with the Texas claim in sending it to the Secretary of War. Now, touching Oregon. Some years ago I investigated the Oregon claim, and it is a claim pure and simple. As to the Northern States which the gentleman speaks of, New York and others, in pursuance of legislation and under the law the claims were investigated by the Treasury Department and audited, and the audit covers claims and amounts that are due under the law and are certified, entirely different from this matter.

Now, gentlemen, let us see about the propriety of it, and it is perfectly plain. Some years ago there was an act of Congress concerning disputes between Maryland and South Carolina, and, I believe, Georgia and Virginia, claims and counterclaims against the United States and against the States, and under that legislation not only as to South Carolina, but, I believe, Georgia, and certainly Virginia and Maryland, there was a complete settlement.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there? I am sure the gentleman does not want to make that statement.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CARLIN. If the gentleman will look at that account it will be seen that neither in the settlement with Virginia or Maryland were the items here contended for included.

Mr. CANNON. It was a complete settlement of claims and counterclaims between the United States and the States named. I merely speak of that. The gentleman and I do not agree about it. I was on the committee that reported the appropriations that resulted in the payment of them.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is certainly mistaken in regard to it.

Mr. CANNON. Gentlemen talk about a sovereign State and a claim that dates back almost to the time of the adoption of the Constitution, in favor of Virginia and Maryland, and many other States, and we do not agree about it. And yet against the rules of the Senate, against the rules of the House, they come and put these claims on a supply bill, and here we are.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have two or three minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Here, after 1 o'clock in the morning, we are upon a bill carrying between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000, considering a law appropriating for the public service, thrashing out and disputing about the validity of claims that ought to have been investigated by the proper committee and thrashed out, standing upon their own merits. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. I will say to the gentleman that the Virginia claims have been investigated by a dozen Congresses.

Mr. CANNON. And my recollection is that the Committee on Claims investigated this very claim of Virginia and reported unanimously against it.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman's recollection is absolutely at fault. It was never before the Court of Claims.

Mr. CANNON. I said the Committee on Claims, and Representative MILLER made the report.

Mr. CARLIN. That is the only committee in the history of Congress that ever did it.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; but that shows when it gets to the proper committee and they investigate and unanimously report against it—and it was not reversed—the impropriety of this proposed appropriation to pay these claims, the statement that the Government repudiates them, and all this, that, and the other.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I would rather not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Now we have thrashed it out. The House refuses to recede and agree to these claims. Your conferees did. The Senate refuses to recede and come to a complete agreement, and we report the disagreement, and it is up to the House to say whether or no at the hour of half past 1 o'clock, with all these things in front of us, we are going to concur. If we do, why, we concur, and these claims are paid, or whether we will adhere. I am for adhering [applause] and sending it back to the Senate, and then it will be for the Senate to determine whether it will recede; and if they do not recede, this supply bill of nearly eight millions of dollars, covering all along the line of the public service from California to way down East, in Maine, carrying items that are authorized by law, will fail. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the course of business we sent to the Senate a general deficiency bill carrying items necessary to pay expenses in the main incurred in the last fiscal year—ordinary items authorized by law. The Senate has added to that a number of claims. We have Claims Committees in the House. Any Member of this House can introduce a bill covering the items and have it referred to and considered by the committee of the House which considers claims. I do not object that the Senate has added these items as amendments to the bill.

They thereby present them for consideration to the House and to the House conferees. But we have no knowledge concerning the claims. They have not been acted upon by the proper committees. We are not ready to say that the claims ought to be allowed.

And what situation do we meet? The Senate says, "If you do not allow claims which you are not ready to allow we will not permit you to pay the just, unquestioned judgments of the Government." [Applause.] "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute"—even to the Senate of the United States. [Applause.]

There are people in the country who believe that the House of Representatives at times does not exist. Some of those gentlemen must be inhabitants of the body at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause.] And I am in favor of letting them know now, as well as in the future, that the House, while it is prepared to provide for the necessary expenses of the Government, will not be held up by the Senate, or held up on the street with a bludgeon. [Applause.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is within his rights. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] had been here as long as I have been, he would know that we have had these contests with the Senate heretofore. That is what this is—a contest with the Senate over Senate amendments in the closing hours of Congress, when the threat is made to us that if we do not kneel and yield to demands that ought not to be presented we will be held up to the country as opposing the furnishing of the needed supplies of the Government. Let them take the responsibility for killing the bill, if they will. Let us say now, "We stand where we stand," and let them do what they please. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adhere to its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, just one second. I want to say to the Chair that so far as the Virginia and Maryland claims are concerned, we are not going to move to agree to the Senate amendments. I stated in my previous remarks that I would do so. It is perfectly apparent that there is not a quorum in the House and I am not willing to submit those claims to the judgment of the half dozen Members in the Chamber.

Mr. LAFFERTY. And Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion to agree.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House adhere to its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 22, 33, 34, and 114. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider that vote and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves to reconsider the vote by which the House adheres to its disagreement and to lay that motion on the table. Without objection, that motion will be agreed to.

Mr. CURRY. I object.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, is not that motion unusual?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is unusual, but it means that either the Senate recede or this bill fails to become a law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what is the motion? I ask to have the motion stated.

The SPEAKER. The motion was to reconsider and lay on the table.

Mr. MANN. To lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. Yes; to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York if his motion included a request for a conference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did not.

HOUR OF FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a privileged resolution.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will not do that until the bill is disposed of. We would thereby place ourselves at the mercy of the other side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that we have adhered, and I take it that the House means to adhere. This bill is enrolled, and it can be passed and become a law before 3 o'clock. There is no occasion for this House or this Congress to stay another day. If they do not pass this bill before 3 o'clock, the resolution is not effective.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 65.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of August, 1912, at 3 o'clock a. m.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this general deficiency bill is enrolled along the line that the House has pointed out in its adherence to its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

I myself shall regret, and I have no doubt that my colleagues on this side of the House will regret, the failure of this bill to become a law, but it is not a supply bill. It is a claims bill. It may be embarrassing to some people that these claims are not paid, but there are many claims that come before Congress by which people are sought to be reimbursed, which claims are not paid. But the time has come, in my judgment, when this House has the right to assert its position. The conferees on the part of the House receded on the legislative provisions placed in this bill by the House. It was their duty to recede when the other House would not accept them.

The only points in dispute now are these claims that have no right whatever upon this bill. If the House desired to accept them, they could become a law; but irrespective of their merits there is not a man in this House who contends for a moment that the claims that are now in dispute between the two Houses are rightfully on this bill; and when the House declares its position that it will not allow these claims to remain on the bill, then if the Senate of the United States insists on violating not only the rules of this House, but those rules that have governed the managers of the conferences between the two Houses for many, many years, the responsibility for the failure of this bill to become a law will rest at the other end of the Capitol, and not upon us. [Applause.] We have completed the work of this legislative session. There is no reason for us to sit here an hour longer, except to give the Senate a chance to recede and send this bill to the President of the United States. I therefore call for the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have a further resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 709.

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States, to inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn, unless the President has some communication to make to them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as members of the committee on the part of the House Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. CANTRILL, and Mr. MANN.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it has been customary at the close of each session for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to submit to the House a review of the appropriations made during the session of Congress.

The condition of the supply bills has been such that it has been impossible to prepare the totals of the various bills, or the statement, in time for presentation before the adjournment.

I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to place in the RECORD a statement reviewing the work of the Congress relative to the appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may have the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. And also that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] have the same privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the Members that we shall endeavor to give this statement to the press by Monday afternoon at the latest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 26, 1912.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. GALLINGER took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects. The reading will be continued.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal, and it was approved.

SENATORS FROM WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 386.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand the unfinished business before the Senate is the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill, and that the pending motion is the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to recede from the Senate amendments. That motion has not yet been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending business is really the morning business. The Chair thinks the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is undoubtedly in order under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I only wanted to see that we did not lose track of the latter matter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Since making the suggestion, the Chair recalls the fact that there is a rule of the Senate to this effect:

RULE VII.

* * * * * * *

3. Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer, unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When I rose, Mr. President, no Senator had claimed or sought to claim the floor for the purpose of introducing morning business; and I assumed, and I assume now, that there is no morning business to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair, however, to call for morning business, if the Senator please, and under this rule of the Senate——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If there is any morning business, I withhold my motion until that is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order; and the Chair presents a petition from the governor of West Virginia and certain other citizens of that State relating to the election of the Senators from West Virginia, which will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the nature of that petition, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be developed by its reading.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the petition be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the petition will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the petition.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask what is the paper which is being read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a petition signed by the governor of West Virginia and other citizens of that State addressed to the Senate. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has asked that it be read, and unanimous consent was given for the reading.

Mr. WARREN. I was not making any objection. I simply wanted to know, as we went along, what was being done. My attention was diverted for the moment.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the petition.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, when I inadvertently asked to have this document read, I did not know the subject to which it referred, and, to tell the truth, as is well known in the Senate, it was desired at this time to delay the proceedings a little until certain conferences might be held, with a view of having some of the difficulties incident to the deficiency bill adjusted in order to expedite the adjournment of Congress. I now withdraw my request to have the document read and ask that it be not printed in the RECORD but be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The reading of the document has almost been concluded. It has gone so far as to disclose the most serious charges against Members of this body. It seems to me the honor of the Senate would require that the reading be proceeded with and that the matter be investigated. I do not believe charges of this kind can be rendered harmless or be disposed of by being suppressed. They ought to be given publicity, and I request that the reading be continued—I understand it is almost completed—and that the document be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator who presented that petition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The governor of the State did.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senate is about to adjourn, and while I do not object to documents being presented——

Mr. PENROSE. I do not object to the document being read, of course, especially as its reading has been nearly completed. When I made my suggestion just now, I thought perhaps there was a good deal more of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Only now six or eight lines.

Mr. PENROSE. That is all right. I want to finish my explanation if the Chair will permit me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be concluded.

Mr. PENROSE. May I conclude my statement?

I had been advised that the difficulties relating to the deficiency bill had been adjusted, and I simply rose to save the time of the Senate. If the reading of the document is nearly finished, let it be completed and let the document be referred to the committee, and, of course, investigated. I only wanted to explain to the Senate again that I know nothing of the document; I never heard of it before and would not have consumed the time of the Senate with its reading, which is not entirely regular, had it not been that I wanted to consume a little time until conferences could be completed, and thought some document would be good to read.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should have objected to the reading of it and to its being printed in the RECORD if I had known its contents, because I do not believe that any man ought to be permitted to spread such accusations against a fellow man, Senator or not a Senator, upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD until he has presented some evidence in support of them. The orderly way would have been for this memorial to have gone to the committee, and after the committee had determined for itself whether there was any probability that these charges could be supported, then reported it to the Senate, either recommending an investigation or giving its opinion that an investigation was not necessary.

I think the Senate will set a dangerous precedent whenever it advertises to the world that the most reckless and irresponsible man may sit down and indict any Member of this body in language of the coarsest and most brutal kind and have it printed as a public record.

I want to say besides, Mr. President, without desiring to challenge the action of the Presiding Officer, that, in my opinion, no memorial can be presented to the Senate in the way this has been presented. My opinion is that a memorial can only be presented to the Senate by a Senator, and that John Smith or Bill Jones can not be permitted to vent their spleen against somebody by sending it to the Chair. If a Senator presents it he presents it on his responsibility as a Senator, as a matter of course. It seems to me that this is a grossly improper proceeding.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I only desire to add a word. Of course, I have no desire to suppress this or any other document. I simply wanted in a way to apologize to the Senate for having asked for a proceeding which is irregular and unnecessary, and to state that the reason therefor was to give a few minutes longer for a conference that was being held in the cloakroom. I understand that this document, as a matter of fact, has been given to the press or will be given to the press and there is no secrecy about it. It is simply a matter of maintaining the regular course of procedure.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a matter not in the ordinary course of business; there is not any justification for it. I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I have no desire to suppress any document which is supported by even a reasonable show of proof, but I would suppress an unwarranted attack upon the humblest citizen of the Republic.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not mean to imply for a moment that the Senator did not want a full investigation of the matter.

Mr. BAILEY. I would exclude this memorial until these memorialists can show that there is some reasonable expectation of supporting their charges. I do not believe in indiscriminate charges. I venture to say that there is not a Senator in this body against whom charges of misconduct have not been made, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred those charges were without foundation, or certainly in a large majority of the cases.

I have no interest in it, but with precedent established the Senate, if the present distemper of the public mind continues, will from day to day sit here and hear every Member arraigned in this way. If there are guilty ones they ought not to be protected, and I assume that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will not protect them, but I do insist that before any man, governor, as seems to be the case here, or anyone, shall be permitted to incorporate in the permanent records of this country a violent attack upon the character and integrity of his fellow man, he should first offer some proof in support of his charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In justification of the action the Chair took, the action of the Chair having been challenged and pronounced irregular——

Mr. BAILEY. Hardly challenged, but criticized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to Rule VII, which says:

> After the Journal is read the Presiding Officer shall lay before the Senate messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of departments, and other communications addressed to the Senate.

The Chair found a document, in the nature of a petition, before him addressed to the Senate of the United States, signed by the governor of a State and several other presumably reputable citizens, which was laid before the Senate that it might be referred to the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. As I said, I did not intend to challenge the action of the Chair, though I did venture to criticize it as unwarranted by the rule. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that following the language which he has just read, the next sentence begins: "The Presiding Officer shall then call for, in the following order, the presentation of petitions and memorials." If petitions and memorials were included in the other, then they need not to have been enumerated in what follows, and I think the rule contemplates only that the Presiding Officer shall lay before the Senate such communications as are properly addressed to him.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with what the Senator is saying about the propriety of printing, and I would not resist a motion to expunge it from the RECORD. I think, however, that it would excite more curiosity if it were left out than if it were printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BAILEY. I interpose only to protest against the practice. Enough has already been said to make it evident that the Senate is being used now merely to further a campaign of publicity. We have already been told that this matter has been given to the press. I think, however, the country will not omit to take notice of the fact that although these alleged occurrences took place two years ago, the honorable governor of the State, whose dignity has thus been outraged, waits not only two years, but waits until the very day before the Senate adjourns, and except for an extraordinary situation which arose Saturday night it would have been too late to have reached the Senate until after its adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks in justice to the Chair the statement made ought to be supplemented by the suggestion that this was in the nature of a communication addressed to the President pro tempore, and there are thousands of precedents to sustain the action of the Chair. The Chair hopes that the action taken will not be found to be either in violation of the rules of the Senate or the proprieties of the occasion. If the Chair had suppressed the document, it would have been a very serious matter, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as I understand the rule, it was the duty of the Chair to lay the matter before the Senate and have it referred to the proper committee. I think the Chair was not only justified in so doing but he was following the rules which he is bound himself to enforce.

But, Mr. President, I think the request for its reading was made under a misapprehension as to what it was, and I think there went into the RECORD certain matters that ought not to be printed in a public and permanent RECORD. Therefore I move that such portions of the matter as have been already read shall be expunged from the RECORD, and that the reading go no further.

Mr. BACON. And that the document be referred to the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. That was a part of the statement of the Chair, as I understood it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the entire matter be expunged from the RECORD?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I move. Of course, none of it would go into the RECORD in any case except what had been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota moves that everything relating to this matter except the presentation of the document by the Presiding Officer and its reference to a committee be expunged from the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I merely want to say that the statement I make is made from recollection, but I believe that the basis for the investigation in the Lorimer case was a communication signed by the president of a voters' league in the State of Illinois and that it was much more vague and indefinite than this communication from the governor of the State of West Virginia. I do not recall that it contained any specific statement of fact, but a general statement that the seat of the Senator from Illinois had been secured through corrupt influences. That is my recollection of it. I remember the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] presented the communication to the Senate.

It seems to me that this document, Mr. President, coming as it does from the governor of the State, containing specific allegations, is a much more responsible document upon which to base a proceeding on the part of the Committee on Privileges and Elections than the document which was presented by the senior Senator from Illinois in the Lorimer case, and followed at once by a resolution for an investigation on the part of the committee.

I am corrected, Mr. President, in my recollection by the senior Senator from Illinois, who says that the Senator from Illinois, Mr. Lorimer, himself offered the resolution for the investigation upon the presentation of the charges made in that communication addressed to the senior Senator.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, neither of the West Virginia Senators is present. The junior Senator [Mr. CHILTON] is sick and absent by leave of the Senate, and the senior Senator [Mr. WATSON] is absent and his absence was properly accounted for in the Senate by the announcement already made.

I simply rose to say that I am quite sure neither of the Senators will in the slightest manner endeavor to prevent any investigation which the Senate may desire to make as to the circumstances attending their election. On the contrary, I am very certain they will welcome anything of the kind, as there is nothing to be apprehended by them in the investigation.

The fact mentioned by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is one which I had previously risen to call to the attention of the Senate, and I will add only a word or two to what has already been stated by him. It is that these alleged occurrences are nearly 2 years old, and since then, during the last 20 months, the Senate has been in almost continuous session. With the exception of, I think, three months and a fraction the Senate has been in continuous session since last January a year ago; and while there were whisperings around about these matters, accompanied at that time by the expressions of these Senators that they were absolutely indifferent to any assaults of that kind which might be made and perfectly ready to receive them when made, and to answer them fully and effectually and conclusively, there has not been the slightest presentation of the matter to the Senate or the slightest movement in that direction until the last day of the present session, when the governor who now comes so courageously to the front knew they were both absent from the Chamber, and at a time when, unless there had been what really was almost an accident in the unforeseen development of differences between the two Houses Saturday night, the Senate would not have been in session at all. And now it is presented at a time when it is known absolutely and certainly to the author of the paper that an investigation would be an impossibility. It was manifestly the design to have these baseless and scandalous charges presented to the Senate and published to the country in such manner that there would be no opportunity to either answer them on the floor of the Senate or to have a committee of this body, by an investigation, brand them as false and malicious; and when——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. BACON. Let me finish this sentence.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. And when thus knowing it would be an absolute impossibility to make such investigation and make a finding and report, he could have had no motive but to spread this slander upon these Senators, upon the public records, and to scatter it in the public prints for the purpose of influencing an election in a coming campaign.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, if the Senator will permit me, I have just examined the date of it. I find it dated Charleston, W. Va., on the 26th day of August, which is to-day, obviously written and sent out on Sunday.

Mr. BACON. I have listened to the reading, it is true, but I could not catch it as accurately as I would do if I had it before me for reading with the eye, but according to the hearing which I was enabled to give it they are charges of the vaguest and most indefinite character. While they are broad, they are without any specifications whatever of anything which would amount to anything. There is no charge made of any corrupt vote received by either of these Senators and no charge of any corruption or knowledge of any corruption by either of them. It is a well-known fact that when these charges were made in West Virginia nearly two years ago the evidence presented to sustain them was recognized as not only false, but ridiculous. All the circumstances of the presentation of this memorial show beyond the shadow of a doubt that it is not made in good faith.

Can anybody who is a sane man believe that in a State like West Virginia, a closely contested political State, that if since last January a year ago, with the Senate in almost continuous session during all that time, there had been any ground for the belief that the seat of either Senator from West Virginia had been procured by bribery, that matter would have been permitted to have rested from then until this good day without agitation and without any effort whatever to have an investigation as to the truth of the charge?

Mr. President, not only is West Virginia a State closely contested between the two great national political parties, but it is also closely contested between factions of the Democratic Party of that State. We have some little mention in this memorial which makes some suggestions in regard to the fact that there are factions there in the Democratic Party. Does anybody believe for a moment that if there had been any foundation for these charges, with not only antagonisms and issues which arise between the great political parties, but with also the antagonisms and issues which arise between factions of the Democratic Party, that that matter would have been allowed to sleep until now? What possible purpose, Mr. President, could there be in the presentation of this paper, except to make use of it in a political campaign?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a second. What purpose could possibly have been had in the presentation of this paper after this long silence in the presence of the known fact that in presenting it now, in the very hour of adjournment, nothing could be accomplished by its author except to spread slander and libel at a time when refutation by the Senate was not practicable, or when, at least, no such investigation could be given to it as would give opportunity for the answer of this body, which, I am sure, would be given, if I am correctly informed as to the facts and as to the utter falsity of these charges?

Mr. President, I would not myself vote to expunge the matter which has been read if so doing would keep it from the public, but we are told that the matter is already given in the press, so that there is no suppression of any allegations which would be made in regard to it. There is no need to suppress them, because, if the reports generally credited are true, the more public these charges may be made the more certainly will they be shown to be false and malicious.

I myself care very little as to the question of printing this memorial in the RECORD, except for our own credit as to whether we will permit slander and libel to be promoted by such means as those to which I have alluded, permitting them to be incorporated in the RECORD. Those who love muckraking will have ample opportunity to gratify their tastes by reading it in the papers, in which it will be published. That is the only motive I would have in excluding it, because, of course, I have no doubt the same motive which caused this paper to be sent here will cause it to be spread in all the newspapers of the country, and there is going to be no suppression either of the memorial or of any allegation of its being excluded from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The exclusion of this from the RECORD is not the purpose of my remarks. I wished only to emphasize the fact that this has been sent here under these circumstances on the last day of the session, and in the last hour, practically, of the session, when it was known absolutely and certainly by the author that an investigation was an impossibility, when he could have had no purpose to try to accomplish anything in the way of investigation, and when his sole purpose must have been simply to take advantage of the opportunity to put these foul and slanderous matters in a way to be used in a political campaign.

Mr. President, if I heard the reading correctly——

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest that possibly one purpose in presenting this matter at this time, or one thing that would be accomplished if it goes into the RECORD, is that it then becomes frankable and can be sent free broadcast over West Virginia and elsewhere in the country.

Mr. BACON. That may have been the purpose of sending it here on the last day of the session. That was doubtless one feature of the general scheme to use the presentation of the paper as a memorial for the purpose of using it to further a political campaign.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WORKS. I thought the Senator from Georgia had yielded the floor.

Mr. BACON. I will yield the floor, Mr. President, just with one word. All of us from every motive desire that any well-founded charge against any Member of this body should be sifted to the bottom and the truth ascertained, and nothing which I have said is to be construed to the contrary of that. These two Senators have been with us now for all this time. They are among our most useful and our most honored Members. They have been here standing all this time in a position to be challenged, if anybody knew aught against them personally or officially, and nothing has been said. I do not question the fact that the whole thing which has moved this has been the unworthy purpose to besmirch men's characters for the purpose of accomplishing political ends. There is no higher duty than to expose and condemn political corruption. But there is no fouler act than to falsely besmirch private or official character for the purpose of gaining political advantage.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I think the Chair was not only justified but was required by the rules of the Senate to submit this question. I think it was a mistake that it should have been read to the Senate, but I think it would be a much greater mistake if we should now attempt to suppress it. The facts that are contained in the petition will go to the country; that can not be avoided; and if this action is taken, in addition to that it will go out to the country that the Senate of the United States undertook to suppress these charges by its action and to conceal them.

It is unfortunate that the Senators who are directly interested in this matter are not here to say for themselves what they desire with respect to it; but if it were I and these charges had been presented in the Senate and had been read, I should ask the Senate of the United States not to suppress or to expunge them from its record. Not only do I think it would be unjust to the Senators themselves to take that action, but I think it would be unjust to the Senate of the United States.

With the comments that have been made upon the presentation of this petition and the manner in which it is brought before the Senate, it is not so likely to injure the Senators who are directly interested in it as would the act that is now proposed, to suppress it entirely. I think, Mr. President, it would be a great mistake and an injustice to the Senators who are interested in this question and the charges that are made. I hope the Senate will not take that action.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, my motion is based upon my objection that our RECORD should be made the cesspool for the lodgment of the virus of all such political malcontents.

The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] is greatly in error if he understands this to be a matter of suppression. I have not asked that the instrument itself be suppressed; but I do believe, Mr. President, that we should not make the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the purveyor or the container of any scurrilous matter against any person on the initiative of some one outside of the Senate who might send it here until after the matter itself has been investigated. My motion does not suppress the article; it sends it to the proper committee; and if the proper committee shall find that there is any justification for an investigation along this line, then the matter will come back to the Senate and the whole thing will go upon record; but it ought not to be spread at length upon record until some reasonable case has been made after an investigation by a proper committee.

Mr. BAILEY. And anyone can then go to the committee room and get a copy of it. There is no possible suppression.

Mr. McCUMBER. It can be obtained if we want to make it public. My objection is not that the press of the country shall not get hold of it, but that this calumny shall not be placed upon the character of these men by printing it in the RECORD until we have some more evidence than a mere statement.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I did not mean to intimate that the Senator from North Dakota was attempting improperly to suppress any part of the proceedings of the Senate or that the Senate itself was desirous of taking any such action; but we may say what we please, it will be so construed by the country. It has in fact by the action of the Senate now become a part of the records. Having become a part of the records by the action of the Senate, it can only be excluded from the RECORD by affirmative action of the Senate. That being so, it is an act of suppression, call it what we may; and I think it would be a very unfortunate thing to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that the matter be expunged from the records of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that neither of the Senators from West Virginia is here, it seems to me that it would be doing them a great injustice to take any action whatever which even had the appearance of trying to avoid or evade or suppress the fact of these charges. The charges have been made, of course we know nothing about the proof which is capable of being produced to support them; but the investigation will disclose that.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and others have called attention to the circumstances under which the petition was introduced as tending to discredit it. If their suspicion is well founded, an investigation will disclose it. There is not a Senator here, I imagine, who, if these charges were presented against him, would not instantly ask for the fullest publicity and ask for an investigation. I have seen Members of the other House and of the Senate when informal charges and informal insinuations and newspaper editorials were brought to their notice, rise to questions of personal privilege and themselves read the charges into the RECORD and ask for an investigation. I know personally very well one of the Senators from West Virginia, and am on the friendliest terms with him—I refer to the Senator from West Virginia, Mr. CHILTON—and if he were here I am sure he would resent any attempt to suppress this petition or to keep it out of the RECORD or to prevent the fullest publicity. Believing so, I think the motion of the Senator from North Dakota ought not to be adopted.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a very few words. A petition of this sort, coming to the Senate under ordinary circumstances, should not only be presented but it ought to be read; but this petition comes here discredited; it comes here at a time and under circumstances when there is no possible escape from the conviction that it was sent here for ulterior purposes. It is intended for muckraking campaign purposes. I am sure that neither of the Senators from West Virginia desires to suppress anything. I think it is almost certain that if either one of them were here, he would demand that it be read, so far as he personally was concerned; but for my part, as a Member of this body, I object to thus dignifying a paper coming here under the circumstances and at the time this paper comes, when it is perfectly clear that it was sent for dishonest and improper purposes and designed as a slanderous attack on the reputation of Senators solely for political purposes. Therefore as a Member of this body I object to having a paper coming here discredited and under the circumstances attending its introduction dignified by being inserted in the RECORD and the RECORD being made a vehicle for the circulation of a vicious attack made under improper circumstances and for campaign purposes. For those reasons I hope the motion of the Senator from North Dakota will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a word, Mr. President. Under the rules of the Senate no Senator here has any right to make a statement against the character and standing of another Senator. Has a person outside of the Senate any greater right than have Senators on the floor to put into the RECORD defamatory matter, without the right of a committee of the Senate to first pass upon that matter? I almost resent the appellation "suppression." No one has asked that anything be suppressed. All we have asked is that this indictment, coming from an outside source, should not be spread upon the records of the Senate until a committee can pass upon the propriety of making it a public record here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that the matter be expunged from the RECORD.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, returned to the Senate the bill (S. 4862) for the relief of certain persons having supplied labor and materials for the prosecution of the work of constructing the Corbett Tunnel of the Shoshone irrigation project, and accompanying papers, it having failed to pass the House of Representatives over the veto of the President.

CAPT. JOSEPH HERRING—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 950).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without approval, Senate bill No. 67, entitled "An act for the relief of Capt. Joseph Herring, United States Army, retired," for the reasons stated in the accompanying letters from the Secretary of War and memorandum of the Commissary General of the Army.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 24, 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Claims and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS AT OKANOGAN, WASH.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a bill was passed a short time ago and approved by the President on July 22. In a communication sent by the Department of the Interior describing the land, the words "township 23" were used instead of "township 33." The bill passed with the township designated in that way. It has since been found that there was an error on the part of the department. It should have been "township 33" instead of "township 23." I introduce a bill to amend the act that has been passed by striking out "twenty-three" and inserting "thirty-three." I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I will say that I have examined the records in the department and found that the mistake was made there.

The bill (S. 7500) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes," approved July 22, 1912, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes," approved July 22, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out in the first section thereof, in the description of the lands authorized to be sold, the word "twenty-three," after the word "township," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty-three."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. McCUMBER introduced a bill (S. 7501) granting an increase of pension to Lurinda P. Barnes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

VIOLATIONS OF THE ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following House concurrent resolution (No. 63), reported it favorably, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 25,000 copies of the majority and minority reports of the committee authorized, under House resolution 148, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890 and other acts be printed for the use of the House, 15,000 to be distributed through the folding room and 10,000 through the document room.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 15626) to provide for the proper deed of conveyance to real estate in the District of Columbia when the United States contributes to its purchase or condemnation, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to House concurrent resolution 65 authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of August, 1912, at 3 o'clock a. m.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 7500. An act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public park purposes," approved July 22, 1912; and

H. R. 25970. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on the 26th instant, approved and signed the following act:

S. 7500. An act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes," approved July 22, 1912.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The following bill of the House of Representatives was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 15626. An act to provide for the proper deed of conveyance to real estate in the District of Columbia when the United States contributes to its purchase or condemnation.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 386.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask leave to amend the resolution by striking out, on line 15, page 1, the words "Members of" and inserting in lieu thereof "Representatives in."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I also ask unanimous consent to amend by inserting after the word "and," on the same page, the words "Members of."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it has been suggested to me that the amendment inserting the word "reputable," before the word "attorneys," might be construed by malicious persons as reflecting on the good faith and credit of the committee. Of course I had no such thought, and I ask to withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend by striking from the resolution the word "reputable," before the word "attorneys." The Chair is informed that that amendment has not been agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I rose to ask the Chair whether the several amendments offered by me on yesterday have yet been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed—the Chair was laboring under a misapprehension—that the amendment has not been agreed to, and is now pending. The Senator modifies it by striking from the proposed amendment the word "reputable," and the amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "attorney" and insert the word "attorneys."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution the following words:

And that any parties to the examination may be represented by attorneys if they so desire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that the whole resolution, which is rather an important one, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that the resolution as amended be read?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Looking at the line which was amended a moment ago, I think I prefer to leave in the word "and"; simply insert a comma between "Members of" and "and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that change will be made. The resolution as amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the statement made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, in the Senate on Wednesday, August 21, 1912, be, and is hereby, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, appointed under S. Res. 79, agreed to on April 29, 1912.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate fully into all statements and questions of fact referred to in the statement of personal privilege made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, on the floor of the Senate, August 21, 1912; including all correspondence and financial transactions between John D. Archbold and George W. Perkins and Col. Theodore Roosevelt and Representatives in Congress and Members of the United States Senate from 1900 to the date of the investigation; and further, said committee is authorized and directed to investigate into and ascertain the amounts of money expended by or on behalf of any candidate seeking the nomination of any political party formed or in the process of formation for President during the year 1912, or by any committee or person acting for or on behalf of such candidate, or in the interest of such candidate or party; and to ascertain the names of all persons, firms, or corporations contributing to any of the purposes aforesaid, and the amounts paid or contributed, and how and when paid, including all sums of money used to secure the election of delegates to any national convention or to influence the actions of delegates at said convention.

Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, and to hold sessions at such place or places as may be deemed most convenient for the purposes of the inquiry; to employ attorneys, stenographers, and such other clerical force as may be deemed necessary; to subpœna witnesses; send for persons, books, records, and papers; and to administer oaths, and any parties to the examination may be represented by attorneys if they so desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a provision there that strikes me as liable to result in almost indefinite delay. I refer to the provision that parties in interest may be represented by attorneys. It is left to the committee to determine whether the committee shall employ attorneys or not, but if every witness the committee calls is entitled to have an attorney, considering the right of a witness with respect to time and likewise the convenience of attorneys, with no discretion in the committee, it strikes me that it will lead to a prolongation and indefinite enlargement of the record of the hearing. I simply make the suggestion. I do not propose to combat anything. I favor the general scope of the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. This is not an uncommon practice. I believe there were attorneys in the Ballinger investigation and in many other investigations. I think, however, the committee can regulate the matter very well. It can pass rules and regulations as to how these attorneys shall appear, and in what number. It is largely under the control of the committee, I think.

Mr. CLAPP. That is the trouble. In other cases that have been before the Senate, at one time an official was involved, at another time it referred more especially to a particular person. In this resolution there is the right to every single witness to have an attorney.

Mr. PENROSE. I will modify it and say that parties to the examination may employ attorneys, subject to the rules and regulations of the committee.

Mr. CLAPP. "May be represented by attorneys."

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; subject to the rules and regulations which it may establish.

Mr. CLAPP. That would be all right.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, as he is chairman of the subcommittee, to the language of this resolution. The statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is referred to the "Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate or any subcommittee thereof appointed under Senate resolution 79, agreed to on April 29."

Now, then, follows the declaration—

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed—

And so on.

Which subcommittee has authority; how many subcommittees have authority?

Mr. BAILEY. The subcommittee.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course I had observed that there was some confusion in the language, but I take it for granted that the resolution refers to the subcommittee appointed under Senate resolution 79.

Mr. CULBERSON. The resolution says this statement is referred to the full committee or any subcommittee. Which reference is it—to the full committee or the subcommittee?

Mr. CLAPP. Right there, it goes on to say, as I recall it—I have not a copy of it—or any subcommittee appointed under Senate resolution 79.

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes. All I wanted to do was to invite the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee to this confusion of language, so that it might be cleared up and made clear.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me? That portion of the resolution comprises the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I recognize that the language, while not vague or obscure, was not such as it should be; but as it is his amendment, I did not want to interfere with it. I do not think there will be any trouble in conducting the investigation as the resolution is worded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the resolution, the words:

And that parties to the examination may be represented by attorneys, subject to such rules and regulations as the committee may make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that modification will be made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, Saturday afternoon, in a brief statement to the Senate, I declared that I would not support this resolution in so far as it related to the election of presidential or vice presidential electors or the nomination of candidates for President or Vice President, because under the Constitution of the United States Congress has no power over the election of a President or Vice President and has no power to regulate the election of electors.

I do not believe any Senator has ventured on the floor of the Senate to challenge that construction of the Constitution. But Senators have suggested, in the cloakroom and elsewhere, that I must be in error in that contention, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate for only such time as will enable me to incorporate in the RECORD an extract from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I incorporate that extract so that the Senate may see that if I am in wrong I have been misled by that great court.

Years ago, in the State of Virginia, a man by the name of Green was indicted for casting an illegal and corrupt ballot in the election of presidential and vice presidential electors. He sought to avoid a conviction under that indictment by challenging the law of the State and declaring that if he was indictable at all it was under the Federal law, as he had cast his vote for a Federal officer. That case came to the Supreme Court of the United States, and this is what the court said in answer to that contention:

Although the electors are appointed and act under and pursuant to the Constitution of the United States, they are no more officers or agents of the United States than are the members of the State legislatures when acting as electors of Federal Senators, or the people of the States when acting as electors of Representatives in Congress.

Subsequently, in the Michigan case, where it was contended that the law of Michigan providing for the election of electors by districts was in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, the court uses this language:

In short, the appointment and mode of appointment of electors belong exclusively to the States under the Constitution of the United States. They are, as remarked by Mr. Justice Gray in In re Green (134 U. S., 377, 379), "no more officers or agents of the United States than are the members of the State legislatures when acting as electors of Federal Senators, or the people of the States when acting as the electors of Representatives in Congress." Congress is empowered to determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they are to give their votes, which is required to be the same day throughout the United States; but otherwise the power and jurisdiction of the State is exclusive, with the exception of the provisions as to the number of electors and the ineligibility of certain persons, so framed that congressional and Federal influence might be excluded.

The question before us is not one of policy, but of power.

So, Mr. President, I submit that while it is entirely competent for the Senate to pursue the investigation with reference to Senators, and I think it is entirely competent for the House to pursue any investigation it chooses with respect to Members of the House, and it is certainly competent and proper for the Senate to call for any papers or documents which may tend to show the corrupt election of a Senator when he was chosen or his misconduct since he was chosen, so that it may exercise in the one case its power to determine whether or not he was duly elected and in the other case its power to expel him if his conduct justifies such action, I submit that so far as the presidential and vice presidential electors are concerned and so far as the nomination of presidential candidates is concerned, Congress is absolutely without any power.

I am not unmindful that the present corrupt-practices act prohibits certain contributions in elections where presidential and vice presidential electors are chosen. I was on the Committee on Privileges and Elections when that bill was before it and when it was reported, and I protested against the amendment which brought presidential and vice presidential electors into it. The bill was introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and when introduced contained no such provision. Without intending to impeach the motive of any man, because that is always a dangerous proceeding, for none of us can search the heart of a man and discern his motives, but disclaiming any intention to impeach the motive of any man, I have always believed that that amendment was forced into that bill in the hope of preventing its passage.

It is absolutely certain that when they forced that amendment into that bill they knew that they would force me to vote against it. I was compelled to vote against reporting it, and I would have voted against its passage but for the fact that it was called up in the Senate when I was occupied with other duties. Of course if the present law in that respect is valid, then this amendment, providing that this inquiry shall be extended to presidential and vice presidential candidates, would also be a lawful exercise of power. But just as I am absolutely certain that the present law, so far as it relates to presidential and vice presidential electors, is a nullity, so I am satisfied that this amendment, if adopted, would be a nullity.

I can understand the feeling of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. His name having been presented for that great office, some question having been raised as to the use of money, though it was not with reference to his own candidacy, I can understand how he would want the whole matter fully and thoroughly examined and the result of that examination laid before the American people. But we are limited in our actions here by the Constitution of the United States, and we are not permitted, no matter how much we might be disposed to oblige one of our associates, no matter how much we might desire to know whether it is true or not that these enormous sums were expended, and although our desire for that knowledge might not be, and I am sure is not, a matter of mere idle or political curiosity, to force any man to testify with relation to those matters.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. BACON. Conceding the soundness of the arguments presented by the Senator as to the relation the electors bear to the Federal Government, not endeavoring in any manner to minimize that, I want to suggest to the Senator that there is one contingency under which the election of President is not an election under officers of States.

Mr. BAILEY. No; that is in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me. The Senator has not permitted me to finish my question.

Mr. BAILEY. Excuse me. I thought I would answer it——

Mr. BACON. The fact is that there is a contingency in which the President may be elected by those who are not State officers. It is true that they are not in any technical term officers of the United States. Members of Congress are not; but still they are those who hold official station under the Federal Government. They are themselves a part of the Government. I presume the Senator will recognize that if this were an election in which the people at large chose a President, this legislation would not be subject to the criticisms which he is now making.

Mr. BAILEY. It would not be if the Constitution excluded that, but it would depend on the amendment of the Constitution submitting it to the people at large.

Mr. BACON. The Constitution now prescribes that if the majority of the electors shall fail to vote for one man for President and thereby secure his election, it shall go to the House of Representatives, and when it gets in the House of Representatives——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. At the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr CUMMINS], who has the joint resolution in charge and who is necessarily absent, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. The point I wish to present to the Senator is that when the election goes into the House of Representatives by reason of the failure of the electors to make a choice in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, the House of Representatives is perfectly free to chose any one of the three men whose names were presented as candidates. They are not restricted to any party. They are under no moral obligation, we may say, as the elector is, because the elector is now, under the unwritten law, the mouthpiece of the voters. When it comes to the election by the House of Representatives any Member of the House is perfectly free to determine for whom he shall vote, or according as he thinks this, that, or the other man may be the best of the three men. He is authorized to vote against a man if he does not believe he is a model man. He is authorized to vote against him if he does not believe he has pursued proper methods in securing the votes he did secure. Therefore, it seems to me that the argument presented by the Senator against this bill might be a conclusive one granting his premises, but there would be still one feature to be considered in this matter which does not come within the scope of his argument.

Mr. BAILEY. Allowing all the Senator says, it would be for the House of Representatives to determine with respect to the President and not for the Senate, because the Senate has no power to elect the President. If the Senator will examine what I said on Saturday, he will find that I was careful to say that Congress has no power over the election of a President, and to-day I have said the Senate has no power. I was not, of course, forgetful of the conditions under which the Senate might be required to choose a Vice President and the House required to choose a President, but the Senate would have no more right to inquire into the candidates for the Presidency than the House would have to inquire into the candidates for the Vice Presidency.

But I do not stickle even on that. I go to the proposition that until it has been ascertained that the regular and ordinary method of electing a President has failed, Congress has no jurisdiction over the subject. There is an ordinary method of electing a President and there is an extraordinary method of electing a President. In the pursuance of the ordinary method Congress has no power, because he is to be chosen by electors, and those electors are to be appointe das the Constitution prescribes.

Mr. President, I believe I will read the rather remarkable language of Oliver P. Morton in an argument which he made to this body upon the appointment of these electors, and it is quoted with approval by Chief Justice Fuller in the Michigan case. It goes as far as I did the other day.

> The appointment of these electors is thus placed absolutely and wholly with the legislatures of the several States. They may be chosen by the legislature or the legislature may provide that they shall be elected by the people of the State at large or in districts, as are Members of Congress, which was the case formerly in many States; and it is, no doubt, competent for the legislature to authorize the governor or the supreme court of the State or any other agent of its will to appoint these electors.

I do not doubt that that is a correct statement of the law. The matter rests completely within the power of the State. Congress has no jurisdiction over it. Contemplating the remote possibility, and not so remote either in the present conjuncture, but contemplating a possibility that has occurred only once in the history of the Republic, the election of a Vice President by the Senate, we might inquire into the conduct of the candidates for the Vice Presidency by what I think would be a strained construction, but that is so remote a contingency that Democrats, at least, will hesitate before they predicate a power upon it.

The balance of this resolution, Mr. President, I would cordially support. I am not much inclined to engage in a mere excursion in the hope and expectation that something might be discovered, but when there is a challenge or a request by a Senator that allegations against him shall be investigated, I think the Senate ought promptly to respond to that challenge or request, and if there are charges against a Senator which he is reluctant to ask an investigation of, I think the Senate ought to be even more prompt in ordering an investigation.

As to the Senate itself, it can not make the investigation too all-embracing to suit me or to command my vote; and I confess to a very earnest desire to know where all this money was obtained with which these presidential aspirations were gratified or by which it was sought to gratify them. I should like to know how all of it was spent, but as a Senator in the Congress of the United States I have no power to inquire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 2, line 2, after the word "investigation," I move to insert "relating to campaign contributions and the conduct of political campaigns."

I do that for this reason: The resolution provides that "the Committee on Privileges and Elections or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to investigate fully into all statements and questions of fact referred to in the statement of personal privilege made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE, on the floor of the Senate August 21, 1912, and all correspondence." I think that should read "correspondence relating to campaign contributions and the conduct of political campaigns." If thousands and tens of thousands of letters were asked for and the subcommittee got a mass of letters they could hardly find what they wanted. I believe it should be confined to political contributions and the conduct of political campaigns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah will be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to call the attention of the author of the resolution to one part of it that, it seems to me, ought to be corrected in the interest of good English. It reads:

> All correspondence and financial transactions between John D. Archbold and Members of Congress and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate is a part of the Congress of the United States, and Senators are Members of Congress, and there is no necessity——

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment has been made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand it has been changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "investigation," insert "relating to political contributions and the conduct of political campaigns."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted, for the reason that it would leave out of inquiry the entire subject matter to be inquired into under the resolution as it was originally introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The whole controversy in that entire matter and the purpose on which the Senator from Pennsylvania rose to an expression of personal privilege was the very question as to whether it related to campaign expenses or whether it did not relate to campaign expenses. To limit the inquiry to merely campaign expenses would eliminate from the jurisdiction of the committee the subject matter which the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to assure the Senator that I do not want to limit the investigation in any way. All I want to do is this——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I appreciate the object that I think the Senator from Utah has in view, and I agree with him entirely that irrelevant correspondence not involving any financial transaction ought not to be inquired into. However the resolution is worded, of course the committee is necessarily invested with some discretion and it would not inquire into it. I think it would be a good deal better if the Senator would withdraw his amendment and leave that matter in the discretion of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that would be all right if the resolution did not give a direction. It directs the Committee on Privileges and Elections to do this. The Senator must know that public men have tens of thousands, and perhaps some of them hundreds of thousands, of letters. I do not see, unless it is arranged in some way, how it could be obviated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is limited in this way, perhaps: The Senator will remember an amendment, in line 14, page 1, of the resolution to transpose the language there so as to read "all financial transactions and correspondence relating thereto." That would limit it in the manner in which the Senator from Utah suggests.

Mr. SMOOT. I will accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah withdraws his amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I will withdraw the amendment and accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Washington state his proposed amendment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is to strike out the words in italics, in line 14, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof "and all financial transactions and all correspondence relating thereto."

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 14, strike out the words "including all correspondence and financial transactions" and insert "all financial transactions and correspondence relating thereto."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A suggestion has just been made to me by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that as so many Senators have returned to their homes it is unlikely that there can be a meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections after the resolution is passed, if it should be passed, and that therefore the resolution could not in any formal way be referred by the chairman of the committee or by the committee to the subcommittee. The suggestion has been made that for that reason the resolution ought to be so modified as to refer it directly by the Senate to the subcommittee that has charge of this investigation. I recall that when the Senator from Pennsylvania first offered the resolution he offered it in that form, and some objection was made here to its being passed in that form, but in view of the situation I am not certain but that it ought to be so modified.

Mr. PENROSE. I looked carefully into that matter in offering the resolution and became convinced that it was not necessary, for this reason: The chairman can refer any matter to a subcommittee of the full committee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that meets the criticism.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to call the attention of the author of the resolution that as the resolution reads——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has been agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not understand that it had been agreed to. I thought the question was on agreeing to the resolution as amended. I think the language of the resolution on page 2, line 2, providing that they shall inquire "to the date of the investigation" is somewhat obscure. I was about to suggest that it read "to the date of the conclusion of the investigation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is agreed to.

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it has been usual for many years, with the exception of last year, for the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations to prepare a comparative statement showing the total appropriations for the fiscal year, giving the appropriations of the year before, the estimates, and other information.

The present chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations has not arranged any prepared speech regarding the finances of the country, its incomes and expenditures, and he does not propose to make or undertake to make any political capital out of this statement, but to state the facts as he sees them. I want to say, and do so with great pleasure, that the President of the United States and his Cabinet have labored conscientiously to curtail expenditures to the lowest limit of safety. The estimates for this year were carefully prepared to be inside the estimated income by a safe margin.

The House of Representatives has, I must admit, endeavored to keep down the expenses of the Government—whether wisely or unwisely will be determined by the country; but I credit them with a desire to be economical and to keep expenses inside the estimates.

The total appropriations, regular, miscellaneous, and permanent, including every allowance of every nature for the year 1913, amount to $1,019,636,143.66. The total appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 were $1,026,682,881.72. The appropriations for 1913 are less than those for 1912 by $7,046,738.06.

The appropriations for this fiscal year are less than the estimates by $21,011,882.89. Of course supplemental estimates later made increased this difference. In order to keep that total of appropriations inside the limit of last year the House, in the first place, made a great many calculations for the coming year only, for the amount of money that will be exhausted between now and the 4th of March. Hence there will probably be, soon after we meet next winter, either a very large urgent deficiency appropriation bill or later a large general deficiency appropriation bill, or there will be in the regular appropriations permission for certain sums to be continued available.

The House, and rightly so, examined carefully the witnesses from the departments to know whether the money appropriated for last year and prior years had all been used or would be used before the end of the fiscal year 1912, thus to find out if there were margins which would go back into the Treasury. They discovered quite large surplus amounts, which goes to show, first, that preceding Congresses have endeavored to be liberal in appropriations, trusting to the capacity, honesty, and economy of the departments not to expend what might be to the credits of different accounts unless necessary, and to the everlasting credit of those who expend the money, there were found numerous and large surplus amounts.

These have all been taken into consideration and have caused smaller appropriations for the year 1913. That, of course, will not materially affect the future. There is also a short appropriation for the Panama Canal because it is nearing completion, and that will decrease still further.

As the Senate knows the canal was supposed to be built from money obtained from bonds, so that the present inhabitants of the United States should not be called upon to pay all the cost of it, but could allow those who may get the benefit of it years afterwards to have the privilege and duty of paying some portion of it. But we have only issued a comparatively small amount of bonds, and we have paid large sums each year, nearly $50,000,000 last year and more than half as much this year. The discontinuance of that will help to make the bills in the future smaller.

I want to say, however, that I do not believe, with the growth of this country, that we have any right to expect the next administration, be it Republican, Democratic, or otherwise, to expend or to appropriate very much less, if any, than our expenses are now running, unless, indeed, we propose to cut into the future and lower the first year at the expense of the others to follow. I am prophesying that in the next four years' run it will be found that the Government will expend annually a billion dollars, more or less—and I believe it will be more—at every session. These shortages, or what I think may be shortages, will of course be provided for, as usual, in deficiencies. I wish to say that in deficiencies the present Congress has been careful, and the preceding Congresses by their legislation have so far as possible wiped out the necessity of deficiencies.

The bills this year as they came from the House have, of course, been added to by the Senate, as has always been done heretofore. They sent the bills over here with that expectation. But we have added, with the single exception, perhaps, of the deficiency bill, only a small percentage, and we are clearly, with a wide margin, within our income; and in the future some provision, whether it may be made by customs tariff or income tax or otherwise, will have to be made sufficient to cover these outgoes.

I send to the desk a prepared table—in fact, two tables—which I ask may go into the RECORD, with accompanying memoranda.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order is made.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the net saving to the taxpayers of this country in all the appropriations this year is over $7,000,000. I speak in round numbers. Not including the increase of pensions and rivers and harbors, the extraordinary increase in the post office, the net increase would be over $37,000,000. So, in addition to providing for an increase in pensions, the increase of $7,000,000 in rivers and harbors, and the various increases in the post-office appropriations—notwithstanding those great increases, we have saved more than $7,000,000 to the taxpayers of this country. The saving was on the agricultural appropriation bill $248,000 and on the Army appropriation $2,891,000. We saved in the diplomatic and consular appropriations $350,000 and on fortifications $1,380,000. We saved on the legislative appropriations $1,148,000, on the Military Academy $98,000, on the Navy $3,257,000, and on the sundry civil appropriation bill $30,000,000, or a grand total of $41,000,000 that we saved, the increases being in pensions and also in the post-office appropriations and the rivers and harbors.

Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator from Wyoming. I believe that with a proper economy in the Government we can save more than $100,000,000 without injuring the efficiency of the Government.

I will ask to put in the RECORD a table showing a comparison of the appropriations of the fiscal years 1912 and 1913. It will show the decreases and also the increases.

The table referred to is as follows:

Comparison of appropriations, fiscal years 1912 and 1913.

Mr. OVERMAN. I also ask to put in the RECORD a table of appropriations by years from 1875 to 1912, showing in 1875 the total appropriations for the Government then were $325,000,000, whereas in 1912 it was $1,027,000,000. Even this appropriation, with this saving, is $562,000,000 more than the appropriations made in 1896, when the Democrats were in full control of this Government. In other words, when Cleveland went out of office, and the year before his successor was sworn in, the appropriations are now $562,000,000 more as compared with that date.

I also ask leave to insert a table showing that the per capita cost of the United States Government in 1850 was $2.60; in 1880 it was $7.30; in 1900 it was $10.78; in 1910 it was $12.10; and this year under our appropriations it will be, so far as I can ascertain, less than $11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the tables presented by the Senator from North Carolina will be printed in the RECORD.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the total appropriations for the fiscal year 1912, and a table of appropriations for the fiscal year 1913.

The appropriations for 1913 are less than the appropriations for 1912 by $7,046,738.06; and the appropriations for 1913 are less than the estimates by $21,011,882.89.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the table referred to will be inserted in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

Total appropriations, fiscal year 1912	$1,026,682,881.72
Total appropriations, fiscal year 1913	1,019,636,143.66

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I also ask leave to insert in the RECORD a comparative table, showing appropriations for the years 1896 and 1913, respectively. The year 1896 was the year the Democrats were in charge of this Government. I ask that these tables be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, during the recent discussion of the parcel-post provision of the Post Office appropriation bill a number of statements were made representing the parcel-post rates as unduly high when compared with existing express rates. I have no intention of occupying the time of the Senate with an extended discussion of this subject, but since a number of comparative tables of rates have been placed in the RECORD I deem it desirable to present for the same purpose some comparative figures I have prepared, based upon information secured from the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

First, however, I desire to demonstrate that even if it were true that the parcel-post rates are higher than express rates, yet they are so much lower than existing postage rates on fourth-class matter that the enactment of this law is fully justified by this reduction in charge for postal service. A comparison will show that the reduction is 25 per cent on the long-distance shipments, and that it varies for shorter distances, until we find a reduction of 88 per cent for the local and rural-route service. If nothing else were accomplished, this is a very considerable achievement in the interest of patrons of the postal service.

The following table shows the present postage charge on 5 pounds of fourth-class matter, the charge under the parcel-post law, the amount of reduction in cents and the per cent of the reduction by zones:

Distance.	5 pounds, present rate.	5 pounds, parcel-post rate.	Reduction.	Per cent of reduction.
Rural route and city delivery	$0.80	$0.09	$0.71	88
50-mile zone	.80	.17	.63	79
150-mile zone	.80	.22	.58	72
300-mile zone	.80	.27	.53	66
600-mile zone	.80	.32	.48	60
1,000-mile zone	.80	.37	.43	54
1,400-mile zone	.80	.46	.34	42
1,800-mile zone	.80	.51	.29	36
Over 1,800 miles	.80	.60	.20	25

The average haul of fourth-class matter is now 687 miles, with the flat rate favoring the long haul. Under the proposed zone rates the average haul will be much less than 600 miles. It is therefore apparent that the parcel-post law effects a reduction of 54 per cent under the present average distance and 60 per cent under the average distance under the new rates.

But the parcel-post rates do not suffer by comparison with express rates. In connection with the committee report upon the parcel-post provision I submitted some comparative tables, showing parcel-post rates for different distances and the express rates on shipments out of New York for similar distances. I took pains to explain that express rates out of New York are lower than in most sections of the country, but several who have reproduced those tables in part have failed to make this explanation and have in some instances shown only the rates on 11-pound parcels, in which case the comparison is, of course, most favorable to the express rates. In order to correct any erroneous impression that may have been given by such comparisons, I present a table showing rates from other points than New York, from which it will be seen that people in other sections of the country are paying considerably higher rates than the shippers from and to the American metropolis.

I would not be understood, Mr. President, as saying that any comparative table I present is absolutely accurate in showing relative rates. Owing to the complexity of the system of express charges, it is impossible to make an exact comparison with a parcel-post rate that applies the same between any two points the same distance apart and on all kinds of fourth-class matter. I believe, however, that by showing the lower rates and also some of the highest rates I am giving those who are interested as fair a basis of comparison as it is possible to do.

Rates given in the following order:

First presents express rates from New York.

Second presents express rates from another city, similar distance.

Third presents express rates from third city, similar distance.

Fourth presents rates established by Bourne bill.

As already indicated, I believe it unfair to compare charges on only the largest packages and ignore the low rates of the parcel post on the small packages. The rates on all sizes of packages should be taken into consideration, for the ordinary patron of the express or parcel-post service sends more small packages than large ones. In fact, experience in foreign countries shows that under an 11-pound weight limit the average size of the parcel is between 3 and 4 pounds. In an effort to show a comparison of rates on all sizes of packages for all distances I present a table showing the parcel-post and the express charges on 11 packages weighing from 1 to 11 pounds—the total weight of the 11 packages being 66 pounds—and also the charges on these 11 packages for each of the zone distances. I then make a total of all charges on all packages for all distances by each method of transportation, showing the difference in the total charges and the per cent of the difference. In this comparison I am using the express rates from New York as taken from the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In this connection, however, it must be remembered that the parcel-post service includes a delivery on a rural route, which the express service does not, so that even if the rates were the same the comparison would result favorably to the parcel-post service. I do not claim that this comparison is absolutely exact, but it is as fair as I know how to make it.

ADVANCE IN PRICE OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. SMOOT. I present a statement showing the exchange value of farm products from the year 1896 to 1911, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD the statement presented by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

THE ADVANCE IN THE PRICES OF FARM PRODUCTS DURING THE PERIOD FROM 1896 TO 1911.

With advancing prices the products of the farm show a much greater advance than do the commodities which the farmer purchases for consumption or for use on the farm.

The average prices of the principal farm products of the East, the South, the Middle West, and the Far West in December, 1911, and in December, 1896, show a remarkable change in conditions during that period. All prices used in the following tables are taken from Bulletin No. 39 and Bulletin No. 99 of the United States Bureau of Labor.

The table which follows shows the average price in December, 1911, and in December, 1896, and also the advance during the period between those dates for all articles except wheat, for which September prices are compared for the reason that, according to the reports of the United States Department of Agriculture, more wheat is marketed by the farmers during September than during any other one month of the year.

Average price in December, 1911, and in December, 1896, and the advance since December, 1896.

EXCHANGE VALUES OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The exchange value of any article represents its real value, and the real worth of any article produced on the farm is measured by its value in exchange for articles which the farmer desires to purchase. No compilation of retail prices for 1911 and 1896 are available, but the retail price of any commodity follows, in a general way, the wholesale price. Without retail prices it is impossible to measure the exact purchasing power of farm products, but the proportionate change in purchasing power is practically the same when wholesale prices are used as when retail prices are used.

Ten bushels of corn equaled in value 46 pounds of Rio coffee in December, 1911, and 23 pounds in December, 1896.

Ten bushels of corn equaled in value 16 gallons of New Orleans molasses in December, 1911, and 7 gallons in December, 1896.

Ten bushels of corn equaled in value 7 barrels of salt in December, 1911, and 4 barrels in December, 1896.

Ten bushels of corn equaled in value 123 pounds of granulated sugar in December, 1911, and 56 pounds in December, 1896.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I now ask that the Senate take up the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to say, so as to have it before the Senate in proper form, that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who had pending one or two motions to which several amendments had been offered by others, has asked me to consider his motion as withdrawn. I therefore now make the motion that the Senate recede from its amendments to the deficiency bill now in disagreement between the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will be considered as withdrawn. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] now moves that the Senate recede from its amendments now in disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am going to occupy the time of the Senate but a very few moments. Because of the position which I took the other morning in opposition to the conference report on the general deficiency appropriation bill, I feel it my duty to make a statement to the Senate that I propose to withdraw my opposition to its present consideration.

I feel, I realize, and I know, Mr. President, that any one Member of the Senate, or possibly any one Member of the House, might defeat the consideration of this bill. I have been induced by the solicitation of my friends here, who are also friends of the bill, to withdraw my opposition to it at this time; and I am induced to do so not only by those considerations, but by considerations of public policy as well.

In the first place, I know that there are many appropriations to pay for claims in that bill to go to men who are absolutely in need, and it is not in my heart, and never has been in my heart, to delay the payment of just claims which the Government owes to the individual employees of the Government.

In the second place, I am induced to withdraw my opposition to it, feeling that I could defeat it if I were so disposed, by the knowledge that within the provisions of that bill is a clause known as the Borah amendment for the relief of people within the reclamation projects. That amendment provides relief for men, women, and children within the reclamation projects of the West who absolutely need protection at the hands of this Government. So that induces me to withdraw my opposition to it.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I assume this attitude very reluctantly, and I think my associates who have united with me in a protest against the treatment of the several States withdraw their opposition somewhat reluctantly. I do so feeling and knowing that the claim of my State, as it has been established by the bureaus of the Government and by the Court of Claims, is absolutely just and ought to be paid; and I feel that, in withdrawing my objection to this bill at this time, we will place our claim at least in a better position for allowance next time.

I make this statement, Mr. President, because I do not want the Senate to feel, and I do not want the country to feel, that in withdrawing my opposition to the bill I recognize for a moment that there is any injustice in the claims asserted by any of the States.

I withdraw my opposition somewhat reluctantly, too, Mr. President, because there is a provision inserted in this bill for the payment of an extra salary to the employees of the Senate and the House. Of course, the Members of the Senate who live near by—those who live within rifle range almost of the Capitol—do not feel as we do about this; but take it in my own case. My secretary is compelled to travel 3,000 miles, and he ought to be paid a little different compensation from that which is paid to some one who lives close at hand.

The result is that in my own case—and I think the Senator from Utah is similarly situated, as are other Senators from the West, if we call for stenographic assistance in the West we must ourselves employ somebody or else pay for the traveling expenses of some one whom we have here. I feel that these employees, Mr. President, ought to be paid, and, but for a feling of patriotism that leads me to withdraw my opposition to this measure, I feel that I ought to stand here, as I said I would the other day, until doomsday or until justice was rendered by the Senate of the United States and by the House of Representatives of the United States to the people whom they justly owe.

With that statement, I want to say now, in all frankness, that I withdraw my opposition to this measure with very, very great reluctance.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a few moments.

The parliamentary situation of the general deficiency appropriation bill is such that any one Senator can defeat it. In addition to that, I am perfectly satisfied that the majority of the Members of the Senate would be willing to vote against receding from the amendment we are considering, if that course were insisted on, certainly if by doing so there was any possible way of securing what was just and right.

Aside from the State claims, it must be remembered that the employees of the two Houses of Congress have been here for nine months. The rule as to Government employees is that they shall work eight hours. Our employees have been working on an average, I am sure, of 16 hours, working not only all day, but a good part of the night. I undertake to say, Mr. President, there is not a reputable private employer in any large establishment in the United States who would have been willing to exact extra work which we have exacted from our employees, and not make a generous allowance—more than one month's additional pay—for the extra work required of them. I consider it most ungenerous, unjust, and unreasonable to deny them some allowance for that extra work.

But the allowance of the extra month's pay, Mr. President, is not in exactly the same category with the four State claims. We may defeat the general deficiency bill, but the defeating of it does not secure any recognition for the four State claims or any recognition of the extra work which has been performed by the employees of Congress. All we could do would be to get some revenge, if there be any satisfaction in revenge, on innocent people for what we consider an injustice to us. I am not willing, so far as I am concerned, to play that kind of a game.

I have, after careful consideration, reached the conclusion that there has not been a free and fair conference between the two Houses in respect to this matter; that such a conference has been denied; but that we have no remedy at this session of Congress, and I therefore unite with the chairman of the committee in saying that I am not willing to insist on a course that will do injury to others and accomplish no good for those who, I think, have been badly treated. I therefore say to the Senate very frankly that I think we ought to recede from these amendments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as in part representing a State that at one time was a portion of the Oregon country I desire to say a word in appreciation of the attitude that has been taken in this matter by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I feel that, in view of the parliamentary situation, he exercised good judgment in abandoning further obstructive tactics against this bill at this time, because, from all appearances, it would be practically impossible for the House of Representatives to recede from the position it has taken on these claims, even if the membership now in attendance upon the other House desired to do so.

A great portion of the amount going to make up the claim which the Senate provided for in favor of the State of Oregon in this bill was expended in the protection of what is now the State of Washington, and the people now occupying that great territory agree with the citizens of the present State of Oregon as to the justice of the claim of the State of Oregon in this regard, and they feel that the Senator from Oregon was justified in the position which, on Saturday night, he stated he would take in regard to this claim, when he said that he would exhaust the resources at his command in order to defeat the bill, if this claim were not agreed to by the two branches of Congress and included in the bill.

I only desired in these few words to put on record an indorsement of the attitude taken throughout this matter by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, in common with the Senators who have been pushing the State claims, I want to say that I have agreed to recede, not that I feel that these claims are not just, not that I feel that the additional amount should not be paid to the employees of the House and the Senate, but I do so in view of the fact that I think not to do so would probably be an injustice to the Members of the Senate who have stayed by us, and it would be an injustice to those who are interested in the deficiency bill. For that reason, and that reason alone, I am willing to recede, but I still maintain that these claims are just and that the additional amount should be paid to the employees of the House and the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to restate the facts upon which the claim of Texas, which is in this bill, rest. That was fully done, I think, or endeavored to be done in the remarks submitted by me on Saturday night last. Unlike some of the other claims, the claim of Texas had never previously been presented to the Congress and passed upon. All I wanted with reference to this claim was to have a thorough consideration of it and a full and free conference on the part of the conferees of the House of Representatives. As I stated Saturday night, that was denied, not even a consideration of the proposition having been given by the House conferees at that conference.

But, Mr. President, I desire to say, in addition to what has been said by Senators on the subject of the State claims, that, in comparison with one of the issues which is raised in this controversy, they are inconsequential. The State of Texas, as a State, cares very little about the $217,000 for performing the duties primarily devolving upon the Federal Government by the Constitution. Texas, unaided, won her independence against Mexico, surrounded, as she was then, by hostile savages and an alien race; and yet I do say that when this small claim was presented, after having been audited by the War Department of the United States, after having followed precedent after precedent in its presentation, it ought to have been adjusted and settled, or, at least, it ought to have been given that fair and generous consideration which Representatives of all the States owe to each State in this Union.

Mr. President, I desire to state, in addition to this and in addition to what has been stated by Senators on this side who have insisted upon the payment of these claims, that there is a larger question involved than the mere payment of these claims. I ask that the Secretary may read from the RECORD the marked paragraph which I send to the desk, from page 13016, in the debate in the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read, and read as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the House adhere——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is something which occurred in the House of Representatives, and if it is the purpose of the Senator to criticize it, I make the point of order that it is out of order under the rules. In neither House can any Member animadvert upon the conduct of the other House.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I propose to have read the proceedings which I send to the desk and then to state the effect of those proceedings upon the bill and the possible action of the Senate of the United States. If that is a criticism of another branch of Congress, well and good; but I dare say it will not be treated broadly in that sense.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The rule, as I understand, Mr. President—I have not time to find it now—does not use the term "criticism" or even "hostile animadversion."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it will be found in Jefferson's Manual, not in the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, Jefferson's Manual is not a part of the rules of the Senate, though it is quite persuasive, very persuasive, of what the rule should be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not only in Jefferson's Manual, but I think the principle is repeated in the rules. I know that the principle is repeated in the rules of the House and I think in the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Texas means to criticize the House, but simply to state what happened in another place.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not care to state in advance what I intend to say, Mr. President, in order to have a suppositious case presented to the Chair for ruling.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas had already criticized the House and animadverted upon its motives, in a way, and then had asked that there be read a part of the procedure of the House. A Member of the House of Representatives can not be questioned elsewhere for what he says in the House of Representatives, nor can a Member of the Senate be questioned elsewhere for what he says in the Senate. At any rate, without taking the time to hunt up the particular language of the rule, but relying upon the knowledge of the Presiding Officer as to what it is, I make the point of order that the request of the Senator from Texas is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, in acting upon the point of order raised, is, unfortunately, not in possession of the nature of the extract which the Senator from Texas has asked to have read.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, what I have said——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I, unfortunately, can not find the rule just at this moment.

Mr. CULBERSON. What I have said here with reference to this matter amounts to this, in substance, that there is a question involved in this controversy above the mere allowance of claims on the part of the States of Virginia, Maryland, Oregon, and Texas, and I propose to state it, preliminary to which I asked that there might be read from the desk an extract from the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair always has been of opinion that Jefferson's Manual, so far as it is pertinent, is and has been recognized as a part of the rules of this body, and the Chair finds in Jefferson's Manual this statement:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or to the particular votes or majorities on it there, because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other;

and the quoting of them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

While undoubtedly in debate in this body, and perhaps in the other body, that rule has not been strictly adhered to, yet, the point of order having been made, the Chair feels constrained to sustain it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, on Saturday night, when this matter was before the Senate on the report of the conferees, at least for the time it appeared simply that there was a disagreement between the two Houses with reference to these matters and that they were presented to the House of Representatives by the conferees and such action taken by that body toward a further consideration by the conferees as might be deemed proper; but, instead of that, as I have been credibly informed, after a motion to continue the disagreement of the House to these amendments the extraordinary and unusual procedure was taken of moving to reconsider that action and laying that motion to reconsider on the table.

Now, Mr. President, I am not talking idly when I say that that affront was made to the Senate of the United States, not only denying a further consideration by the other body, but deliberately taking that step for the purpose of preventing the House itself, if it saw proper to do so, to have a continued and further consideration of these subjects by the conferees.

I want to read the statement upon which my information is based that that course was not only taken, but that it was extraordinary and unusual; and I have no doubt it was purposely intended to raise an issue between the Senate and the House of Representatives as to whether the Senate was a coordinate branch of Congress when it came to the making of appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. It was said there:

This course is unusual——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I renew the point of order. As I understand, the Chair has ruled on my point of order, and yet the Senator from Texas is proceeding to read what occurred. I find this language in the Precedents and Decisions on Points of Order, Gilfry, page 366:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House—

Necessarily by any Member of the other House—or the particular votes or majorities on it there—

Of course, the words "or majorities" cover the rules of the House, with which we have nothing to do—because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

In the Forty-seventh Congress, second session, Journal, page 439:

The President pro tempore (Mr. David Davis)—

Who is the only politically independent President who has ever presided over this body—

The President pro tempore (Mr. David Davis) decided that it was not in order to refer to any action had in the House of Representatives upon any question not officially communicated to the Senate; and the Senate refused to lay an appeal on the table; yeas 24, nays 26.

In that particular case, it is true, the question of order was withdrawn, but that is not the case here.

April 25, 1894, Mr. Dolph, while addressing the Senate, proceeded to read an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives upon the pending bill.

Which is precisely this case.

Mr. Gray—

Senator Gray, of Delaware, I take it—

Mr. Gray raised a question of order, that it was not in order to quote and comment upon a speech made during the same Congress by a Member of the other House upon the same bill. The Vice President [Mr. Stevenson] sustained the point of order, and decided that it was out of order in debate to notice what had been said on the same subject in the other House upon the bill.

An appeal from the decision was laid on the table—yeas 43, nays 2.

There are other precedents, but those are all I can find on this short notice.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have expressed no opinion about the rules of the Senate on this subject except to say that Jefferson's Manual is not a part of the rules of this body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have quoted not only Jefferson's Manual, but the rulings of presiding officers and of the Senate itself.

Mr. CULBERSON. It may be that some presiding officer has so held; and I do not doubt that different presiding officers in this body have held variantly upon many questions; but aside from that, in view of the evidently obstructive policy of my friend, the Senator from Mississippi, I will not detain the Senate with endeavoring to read from the RECORD what was said in another body. However, I will state that from the public press I have observed that it was stated by the mover of the motion that it was not only unusual to do that, but that it was meant by that to say that the Senate either had to recede from its position or that there would be no deficiency appropriation bill.

So I repeat, the consideration of these claims may be put aside, but the other question presented here is whether the Senate of the United States should assert its right to a full and fair conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, or whether it would have submitted to it the proposition that it must recede from its position or see this so-called supply bill fail of passage by the two Houses.

Now, Mr. President, notwithstanding this graver question, this question affecting the integrity and independence of this body, for reasons which have been stated by Senators who stood with me in this controversy, I will decline further to oppose the adoption of the conference report and will let it be adopted with the hope that some time in its history the Senate of the United States will be manly enough to assert its rights under the Constitution.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on this question I want to take the opportunity to thank the members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations on both sides of the Chamber who have served so faithfully, and I may say so strenuously, at this term for their loyal support of the chairman. I think I ought to thank the Senate as a body for the consideration it has shown the Committee on Appropriations. It is true that these large supply bills, which are sometimes passed in 30 to 60 minutes, have at this session been on the floor for two weeks each—sometimes more. But it has seemed always that the more inquiries made the better for the Senate itself and the country, for, on the part of the committee I may say, it has never brought a bill in here that we were not willing not only to sustain, but to explain fully to the Senate.

There has never been a session in the somewhat long service I have rendered where there was anything like the vexatious questions and the long-continued and strenuous sessions in the committee and on the floor that we have had to undergo in the very prolonged session which is to close to-day.

If at any time I have shown impatience in the presentation or consideration of bills, I want to make due apology, and I again want to thank the members of the committee for the good work they have done.

With respect to these claims which we now recede from, I want to say that every matter of that kind ought to have its day. I attach blame to no one, and I do not regret that we spend another day or two here to have the Senate and the country understand the situation. I hope the disputed matter will come up in due course and be settled in the right way hereafter and with the same final good feeling which has characterized the present consideration of it.

I hope the motion to recede will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate recede from the amendments in disagreement between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 138) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States a sum equal to one-twelfth of their annual salaries in lieu of all transportation and other expenses in coming to and returning from Washington for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress was read the first time by its title, and the Secretary proceeded to read it the second time at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Senators will notice that I have changed the joint resolution, eliminating from it the employees of the House, because I assume that if the Senate favors it the House would not object to our handling this subject, so far as the Senate is concerned, as we see fit.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he knows whether the House would object to including the House employees?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We sent to them an amendment of that kind including the employees of the House, and they rejected it. It seems to me the Senate ought to have some rights that a white man is bound to respect at some time. If we adopt this joint resolution with respect to our own employees, I do not think the House would object. I know it ought not to.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly feel that if our employees are so paid the House employees should be paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not observe the language of the joint resolution very closely. In order to accomplish the object the Senator from Oregon wants to accomplish, I suggest that he ought to make it payable out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That can not be done. There is a statute against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will Senators please suspend? The joint resolution has not been read in full.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of July, 1912——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was induced to confine it to the employees of the Senate because in the amendment which was adopted and embodied in the general deficiency bill we included the House employees as well. The House conferees objected to that, and I assume that they would not object to our determining the pay of the employees of the Senate, but would willingly leave it to us to determine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Oregon permit an interruption for just a moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is a very good thing that the Senator has put the joint resolution in that form. Being a joint resolution, it will have to be sent immediately to the House. I have an abiding confidence in the result. I think the House will offer to amend the resolution by making it apply to House employees also, and if they do and send it back to the Senate, of course we will be very glad to accept the amendment.

I want to express the hope that these people will be provided for. There are numbers of them here from way out West—Utah, and California, and Washington, and Oregon, and out at the base of the Rocky Mountains, and on the Pacific coast, who will have to borrow money to get home unless some sort of arrangement is made. There should be some sort of consideration for this geographical misfortune, or possibly geographical good fortune, I do not know which. I express the hope that the Senate will pass the joint resolution and that it will be amended here or elsewhere so as to include the House employees.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, first I should like to know whether the joint resolution as introduced includes House employees?

Mr. CULLOM. It does not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I prepared the joint resolution very much in the form it was originally submitted, and it was subsequently changed so as to include the House employees. I am entirely in favor of the proposition to include them, but inasmuch as the House conferees have turned down a measure for the relief of the employees of the House, I thought we would put it up to them to reimburse the Senate employees alone. If they want to, they can amend it so as to include the House employees, and I would be perfectly willing, as the Senator from Mississippi says, to have them included. In fact, I would be glad of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If they turned down a proposition to pay the employees of both the House and the Senate, they would have much greater reason, would they not, to turn down a proposition that contained only the employees of the Senate? It seems to me the joint resolution ought to go over to the House just as it did before, with a proposition to pay the employees of both House and Senate, and then allow the House to vote on it. They can take it up on a single vote, and instead of sending it to conference we will be more likely to get a direct vote in the House on the proposition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing, I will say, to include the employees of the House, and in omitting them I was merely trying to relieve the measure of embarrassment, if I could.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have very little doubt that if we send over a proposition to pay only the employees of the Senate and do not pay the House employees, the House will peremptorily turn it down, whereas, I think, if it contains both, there are some Members of the House who are in favor of paying these sums to their own employees who may have the courage to get up in the House and move the passage of the joint resolution without amendment, and I want them to have that opportunity.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest, then, that the Senator move to amend it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move an amendment so that it shall include the employees of the House as well as of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. House employees and House Office Building employees?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon modify the joint resolution as indicated?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution as modified will be read.

The joint resolution as modified was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 30th day of June, 1912, including the employees on the maintenance rolls of the Senate and House Office Buildings, the Capitol police, the official reporters of the Senate and House, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, in lieu of all transportation and other expenses in coming to and returning from Washington, for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress, a sum equal to one-twelfth of the annual compensation then paid them by law; and the sum necessary to carry out the provisions of the resolution is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be immediately available.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUR FOR FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Presiding Officer to lay before the Senate the adjournment resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 65), which was read and considered, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of August, 1912, at 3 o'clock a. m.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to submit an amendment, so that it may be dated as of to-day and the hour be 4.30 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves to amend the concurrent resolution. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "twenty-fifth" and insert "twenty-sixth," and strike out "3 o'clock a. m." and insert "4.30 o'clock p. m."

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask a parliamentary question, and that is whether the Chair thinks it necessary to have appointed a committee to wait upon the President before the resolution is finally passed. I do not think it is necessary, but I want to ask what the rule is upon that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. The inquiry is whether the resolution should be passed before a committee has been nominated to wait upon the President and have returned and reported from the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that while ordinarily such action is first taken, it is not at all necessary.

Mr. WARREN. That is the thought I had. It is unusual, but the condition is unusual, and we are through; the work is brought up to the present moment. I understand the enrolling clerks have everything enrolled, except one or two matters that have passed very recently. I understand the Chief Executive of the Nation will not be far away, to meet the committee, and I understand consideration has been had of all measures except those passed this morning. Hence I assume we would be safe in passing the resolution at this time, so that the House may have notice of the amendment.

But the suggestion I made to the Chair was merely to make sure that we were proceeding in the orderly way, a course which, while not perhaps in pursuance of the practice of the Senate, is justified by the unusual circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CULLOM. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration. I desire to state that I hope my name will not be considered in connection with the appointment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 387) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join a similar committee appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses, having completed the business of the present session, are ready to adjourn, unless the President has some other communication to make to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks to be excused from serving on the committee, and the Chair will appoint the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] as the committee on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NELSON. It is necessary to have a brief executive session. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

At 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m. Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia appeared and—

Mr. McCUMBER said: Mr. President, the committee appointed by the Senate to act in conjunction with a similar committee on the part of the other House to wait upon the President and inform him that Congress has closed its labors and is ready to adjourn, unless the President should have some further communication to make to Congress, begs leave to report that it has performed that duty, and has been informed by the President of the United States that he has no further communication to make to Congress.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 3 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., when it reassembled.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have been informed—and, I assume, correctly—that one of the two great parties in the other House had a caucus some time ago, and in that caucus determined certain matters relating to the number and compensation of their employees. I concede the right of the House of Representatives to determine the number and compensation of their employees, but I think the Senate has the same control over its employees. I question the right, not of the House but the right of one party in the House, to dictate as to the employment or the compensation of employees of the Senate or as to the provision for mileage which the Senate may see fit to grant to its own employees. We have passed a joint resolution which covered both the employees of the House and of the Senate. That has not been acted upon by the House; and, as I am informed, it was not acted upon because the majority of the House considered that they were bound by their caucus agreement. Inasmuch, however, as the caucus agreement could only properly cover matters in the other House and could not apply to the Senate and in order that the matter may be brought before the two Houses as to the right of the Senate to pass upon the question of its own employees, I shall offer the joint resolution which we have already passed, but relating only to the employees of the Senate, with the hope that it may be immediately passed and go over to the House. If they do not act upon it at this session, at least it will be before them, so that it can be immediately acted upon at the beginning of the next session. I offer the joint resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 139) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate of the United States a sum equal to one-twelfth of their annual salaries in lieu of all transportation and other expenses in coming to and returning from Washington for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate borne on the annual and session rolls on the 30th day of June, 1912, including the employees on the maintenance roll of the Senate Office Building, the Capitol police appointed by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, the official reporters of the Senate, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, in lieu of all transportation and other expenses in coming to and returning from Washington for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress a sum equal to one-twelfth of the annual compensation then paid them by law, and the sum necessary to carry out the provisions of this resolution is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the same to be immediately available.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I simply desire to ask if it is not practicable to make this a Senate resolution? Why is it necessary to make it a joint resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. Because, if it were a simple Senate resolution, the money could only be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and we have not a sufficient amount in the contingent fund of the Senate to pay it.

Mr. CULBERSON. In addition to that, I understand a resolution of that kind would be void because it is against existing law.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Texas is correct. It could not be paid out of the Senate contingent fund for two reasons: There is not money enough available with which to pay it, and it would be against the law to do so except both Houses joined in a measure which acted as a waiver.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, in submitting for the consideration of the Senate the resolution I am about to present I wish to avail myself of the opportunity to express the sincere regret of Senators on this side of the Chamber, and I am sure likewise those on the other, for the illness which has detained the Vice President from his place as Presiding Officer of this body, and to express the hope that he may be speedily restored to health.

I now offer the resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 386) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are hereby tendered to the Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, for the dignified, impartial, and courteous manner in which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENTS PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it had been my purpose to introduce a formal resolution extending the thanks of the Senate to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who have, during the absence of the Vice President, owing to an unfortunate illness, which we all most sincerely regret, respectively occupied the chair as President pro tempore of the Senate. I have, however, been advised that in the absence of the Vice President it would hardly be proper to introduce a formal resolution. I therefore take occasion in this informal manner to express, not only for myself, but I am sure I am warranted in saying in behalf of all my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber, their and my high appreciation for the kind, courteous, dignified, and impartial manner in which those Senators have respectively discharged the trying duties of the chair during the period when they have presided over the deliberations of the Senate.

I desire also, Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my associates in the Senate, to assure these distinguished gentlemen that they have our best wishes for their happiness and welfare, to wish them a safe return to their homes, and to express the hope that when Congress again reassembles they may return to their duties in vigorous and robust health. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The hour of 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. having arrived, the President pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER) said:

Senators, the hour for final adjournment has arrived. Expressing the sincere hope that you may all reach your homes in safety, that you may have a pleasant vacation, and that upon the resumption of your duties there may be no vacancies in your ranks, I now declare the present session of the Senate adjourned without day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 26, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Trusting in Thy loving kindness, O God, our Father, we draw near to Thee, not as we would, but, as we are able, we bring to Thee our devout offerings. Let Thy blessing, we beseech Thee, descend in full measure upon us now that these Thy servants may be guided by divine light in all the resolves and enactments of this day, that those whom they represent may be faithfully served to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, August 24, 1912, was read and approved.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If a motion should be made to adjourn sine die and it developed there was no quorum, could the House adjourn?

The SPEAKER. Well, the emergency has not arisen. We will cross that bridge when we reach it.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds with his question of personal privilege the Clerk will read the following telegram.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEADVILLE, PA., August 26, 1912.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I respectfully ask leave of absence for the remainder of session on account of serious illness in family.

ARTHUR L. BATES.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania rises to a question of personal privilege, which he will state.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this being District day, I desire to ask for the consideration of some District measures.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire upon what subject the gentleman proposes to discourse?

Mr. MANN. It is in reply to a speech inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], who is here.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, inasmuch as my colleague is here and amply able to take care of himself, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD by myself relating to——

The SPEAKER. Let us get through with this other matter. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday last the gentleman from Alabama—I understand we are not to mention the names of Members in parliamentary discussions.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; there is no such rule as that.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] inserted under leave to print an attack upon me. I say it was unworthy, because it was made by slipping it into the RECORD a few hours before what was supposed to be time for adjournment of the session, which ordinarily would have left no opportunity to meet this assault on the floor of the House. The remarks are dated June 19, more than two months ago, and that length of time before I ever uttered a word on this floor in criticism of the failure of the majority to take action on the immigration bills, and which criticism I only offered because I see everywhere in Pennsylvania the evils of too much immigration, and because I have been overwhelmed with the evidence of the feeling among the people through the medium of communications from the Patriotic Order Sons of America, the Junior Order of American Mechanics, and the attitude of the American Federation of Labor. The assertions of the gentleman are unworthy of any Member of this body, not only because they vilify, but because the author has been caught in the act of attempting to fire and run away.

At no time have I ever indulged in personal invective on this floor, much less smuggle vituperation into the RECORD at the moment of supposed adjournment, nor will I now or at any time stoop to mudslinging which is approached in the alleged speech of the gentleman from Alabama. Language was quoted and imputed to me and the provisions of my immigration bill which will not be found in the measure as introduced.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FOCHT. This sort of posthumous speech, virtually smuggled into the RECORD, contains some rancor, but this I will not countenance in what I have to say; and instead of slipping a reply into the RECORD under unanimous consent, to be under cover until after adjournment, I have written a letter to the gentleman from Alabama, advising him of my intention to reply, so that he might be here to prove his assertions or observe the proprieties of this House and the duty of a gentleman and retract by expunging the injurious statements.

I submit the following letter, addressed to the gentleman, Mr. BURNETT, of Alabama:

[Sixty-second Congress. DAVID E. FINLEY, South Carolina, chairman; HENRY A. BARNHART, Indiana; BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, Pennsylvania.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S., COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
Washington, D. C., August 26, 1912.

Hon. JOHN L. B. BURNETT, M. C.,
Congress Hall Hotel, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg to inform you that I shall rise to a question of personal privilege to-day upon the convening of the House and call attention to your unwarranted remarks about me and the immigration bill I introduced and had referred to your committee.

Meanwhile, I beg to ask you to look into the provisions of my bill and the original immigration commission bill introduced in the Senate by Senator DILLINGHAM and see if either would have admitted the Chinese. I beg to call your attention to the fact that my bill, without qualification or limitation, excluded all persons ineligible to naturalization. The qualification you have in mind and which you attribute to me and my bill was not contained in the bill I introduced or Senator DILLINGHAM introduced, but was an amendment put on in the Senate February 14 and further amended April 15. You are absolutely wrong in every one of your other statements as you are in the Chinese one.

Very truly, yours,

B. K. FOCHT.

The unanswerable and incontrovertible facts are these:

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday, August 24, 1912 (pp. 756–758 of Appendix), is a "Speech of Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT, of Alabama, in the House of Representatives," purporting to have been delivered "Wednesday, June 19, 1912," or over two months ago, which contains personal statements about me and about a bill which I introduced last January and had referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which the gentleman from Alabama is chairman.

The words and sentences which I will quote could not have been in the gentleman's mind, and no words were further from his thought upon the 19th of June than were the unwarranted statements about me which he obsessed himself in Saturday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and which were never spoken on this floor. Last Saturday was supposed to be the last legislative day. Every Member of this House expected it to be. By mere chance, the merest accident, the House did not adjourn without day last Saturday, and by the merest accident and the merest chance I happened to see yesterday what the gentleman from Alabama had slipped into Saturday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of a purported speech delivered in this House two months ago.

I call the attention of the Speaker and the House to the following statements (p. 757 of Appendix):

Mr. FOCHT, of Pennsylvania, introduced one (immigration bill), which in many respects follows the Dillingham bill, but which for confusion and amateurishness is more of a joke than a real bill. It covered 53 pages and contained 39 sections. I doubt whether the author ever read it, but allowed some shrewd joker to impose upon him. He did not ask me for a hearing by our committee on this bill, and possibly only introduced it for home consumption. The last section of the bill also repeals the Chinese-exclusion act and if enacted would soon fill our country with Asiatics, who would drive every white laborer to the poorhouse. There are more than 400,000,000 Chinese in that Kingdom, and they could easily spare 200,000,000 of them. This would be more than twice the entire population of all America. It is unthinkable that any sane man would want to turn loose this great horde of "chinks" on our country.

And then the gentleman from Alabama goes on to comment:

What do you think of that? A medical examination to determine whether or not an alien can read and write. This is a fair sample of much of the Focht bill. Does he not himself need a medical examination?

In the first place, the gentleman from Alabama has inserted in fine print as part of the sentence he purports to quote from my bill, at line 19, on page 15, nine words which are not to be found in the bill. I suppose he will proffer the excuse that the nine words between the two dashes is the work of the printer and that they ought to have been put in larger type and distinguished.

The gentleman says he was made the victim of the printer. That is my answer to his ludicrous "competent medical examination" point. The bill which the gentleman does me the honor to call the Focht bill is identically the same, line for line and word for word, with the exception of seven interlineations, as the Dillingham or Immigration Commission bill. I took the identical bill Senator DILLINGHAM introduced—S. 3175—after it was printed in the Senate and introduced it in the House on January 19, with certain changes I thought desirable. The gentleman is far at sea when he says my bill differs from the original Dillingham bill. I presume attention was called to that typographical error by the agents and attorneys for the foreign steamship companies when he allowed them to come before his committee and express their fears that the Chinese-exclusion acts would be repealed, something they have been working for here in Washington and through the public press for years.

I say again, my bill is identical, word for word, line for line, page for page, and section for section, with the one exception of one section, section 31, which I added in order to repeal the present division of information and display, or employment bureau of aliens, and six little verbal changes. One of these, called attention to by the gentleman in connection with the phrase "competent medical examination," that did not connect with the printer, kept the precise phrase of the original bill prepared by the experts of the gentleman's Immigration Commission, instead of deciphering my interlineation, which was "medical or other competent examination."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Have I used 15 minutes, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to continue until I am through.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I asked leave to interrupt the gentleman awhile ago, and I have got the veto power——

[Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. I surrender.

Mr. CLAYTON (continuing). And unless the gentleman agrees that I may interrupt him, I shall object.

Mr. FOCHT. I surrender.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, then, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to continue to complete his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FOCHT. Well, I would like to complete this——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if this is not a fact. I think there is a misunderstanding between him and the gentleman from Alabama. Both gentlemen are in favor of restricting immigration. I know that, and the House knows that I favor it. The fact is that the gentleman's bill was the Immigration Commission bill. He probably introduced it just as we all introduced our bills—as a foundation on which those who desire a restricted immigration might commence to work.

Mr. FOCHT. That is the way I introduced the bill; exactly as it came from the Senate. I mean to explain, having it all in chronological order.

The bill is a long one and instead of finding fault with any part of its construction, and especially since it was made by the experts of his own commission, the gentleman would be of more patriotic service to his country if he would have had passed some immigration legislation through this House this session. The gentleman dare not deny that there has not been an understanding with the chairman of the Rules Committee and the leaders of the House, for the correspondence published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows it to be so, that has resulted in the suppression of all immigration legislation this session, and may mean the ultimate defeat next winter. And this bill which passed the Senate four months ago has been in the hands of the gentleman from Alabama ever since. The fear that it may be strangled in conference has been expressed by such able Democrats as Congressmen RODDENBERY and DIES, who have raised their voices in protest on this floor, which is something my friend from Alabama has not yet done.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FOCHT. I decline to yield.

Mr. BURNETT. It is my time next.

Mr. FOCHT. Very well. I challenge and brand as a misapprehension the statement made by the gentleman that I introduced this bill for "home consumption," a phrase worn out and indicating impoverishment of the power of expression. My bill would not repeal the Chinese-exclusion act and admit the "chinks" as he says it would. The gentleman must know his error. Section 3 of my bill contains a far better Chinese-exclusion act than the existing one. I call the gentleman's attention to section 3, where it says, page 7, that "all persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization" are excluded. The gentleman must have been depending too much upon specious arguments for his information about the contents of my bill, for if he had ever read it he would have found that section 3 is far stronger than the existing Chinese-exclusion laws. The gentleman certainly knows that a Chinaman or person of the Asiatic or Mongolian race can not become a citizen by naturalization. Medical examinations are to be sought rather than to be abhorred. They are a good thing for literates and illiterates, and I do not object to the gentleman's statement about my favoring medical examinations for immigrants, for every one of them, and the gentleman knows that that is what quarantine is for, that and fumigation.

The gentleman's committee held hearings all last year and has been holding them all this year, and I find from a perusal of the published hearings of both years that practically the same persons appeared before the committee each time. Each time it was the same old line-up, with countenance and speech the same. The Senate committee went ahead and did business, while the gentleman's committee, under his direction, held hearings and did nothing at all effective. With all the time and opportunity offered they have not put a single bill through which looks to excluding undesirables, although promises have been profuse.

An apparently sincere fight was made two years ago, when the gentleman from Alabama abused Republicans, characterizing them as hypocrites and worse, but when he comes in full control himself, as indicated recently by the Democratic leader, he does nothing and gets nothing done in response to the call heard from every quarter of the country.

The misrepresentation of me, whether designedly or not, in regard to Chinese immigration is shown by the facts in the case. In section 3 of the bill I introduced is a provision which would have better excluded the Chinese than they are now. There is an illiteracy test in that section that could have been made to help do the work also. There are other provisions in that section as well as the one debarring absolutely all who can not be naturalized. The bill I introduced, which the gentleman in a far cry has tried to find a petty fault or two with, would have kept out the Chinese, and this has been so stated to me in correspondence I had with the State Department, but which, owing to the injunction of the department, I can not make public. However, I will be glad to show the letters to any Member who does not need "a guardian" and who does not listen to the whisperings of the foreign steamship companies and cheap labor importers and employers. The correspondence was started by the department. The Assistant Secretary wrote me at once, after I introduced the immigration commission bill, stating that he had correspondence with Senator DILLINGHAM and the Senate committee, and suggested that my bill went too far in excluding and keeping out the Chinese. He wrote the same kind of a letter to Senator DILLINGHAM about his bill. Mr. Speaker, in this connection I wish to say that I prefer the opinion of the State Department to that of the gentleman from Alabama, which seems to be the view and attitude held and argued by the agents and representatives of the foreign steamship companies and large cheap labor employers and alien interests.

I know the bill was recommitted in the Senate February 14, 1912, in order to change the phrase excluding all persons not eligible to naturalization in section 3 and soften it down, and on April 15 it was again recommitted to stiffen it up. The arguments of the steamship people about the changed wording being "involved" and "bungling" seems to have convinced some, but it did not convince the Senate committee or a majority of that body.

Mr. Speaker, I have here letters written by the attorneys for the American Federation of Labor, with regard to this Chinese matter. Copies of the letter of March 2, 1912, refer not to the original provision in the original bill or as contained in the bill reported to the Senate on January 18, but to the phrase "unless otherwise provided for by treaties, conventions, or by agreements as to passports":

RALSTON, SIDDONS & RICHARDSON,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS AT LAW,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1912.

Mr. ARTHUR E. HOLDER,
Mr. JOHN A. MOFFITT,
Mr. J. D. PIERCE,
Legislative Committee American Federation of Labor.

GENTLEMEN: You have asked us as to the bearing of Senate bill No 3175, entitled "To regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," upon the matter of the exclusion of Chinese from the country, and in reply we have to say:

The bill referred to, in its section 3, enumerating the persons or classes of persons to be excluded from admission to the United States mentions, among others, "persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by treaties, conventions, or by agreements as to passports." The same proposed bill, by its section 39, repeals "all laws relating to the exclusion of Chinese persons, or persons of Chinese descent, except such provisions thereof as may relate to the naturalization of aliens," and is to take effect from July 1, 1912. The provision relative to the naturalization of aliens and intended to be referred to in the proposed act is contained in section 14 of the act of May 6, 1882 (22 Stat. L., p. 58), and reads as follows:

"SEC. 14. That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

The result of the foregoing is that if the admission of Chinese who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States is provided for by the treaties, they must be so admitted, all of our existing Chinese-exclusion laws being proposed to be repealed. Let us see, therefore, if the treaties provide for the admission of Chinese in the absence of express prohibitive language.

The Burlingame treaty of 1868 recognized the full right on the part of the Chinese to enter, travel, and reside in the United States, the articles controlling the matter being as follows:

"ART. V. The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

"ART. VI. Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States."

These provisions have never been abrogated by treaty, but have only been modified by the treaty of 1880, one of the recitals of which is as follows:

"Whereas the Government of the United States, because of the constantly increasing emigration of Chinese laborers to the territory of the United States and the embarrassments consequent upon such emigration, now desires to negotiate a modification of the existing treaties which shall not be in direct contravention of their spirit."

Article 1 explains the principal modification proposed, and the only one of importance so far as our present purposes are concerned. This reads as follows:

"Whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country, or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, or suspension of immigration, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse."

It will be noted, as a result of the foregoing, that, according to the treaties between the two countries—and the only right of exclusion given by a bill has to be in conformity with the treaties—Chinese laborers are given the right of free admission to the United States until and unless, in the opinion of the Government of this country, their coming or residence affects or threatens to affect the interests of this country, or to endanger its good order, or that of any locality within its territory, when, and in no other event, it is agreed that the Government of the United States "may regulate," limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it.

When Congress passed the exclusion act in 1882, it introduced it with the following recital:

"Whereas, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of the Chinese laborers to this country endangers the good order of certain localities within the territory thereof," following, as will be seen, with exactness, the language of the treaty of 1880. The subsequent exclusion acts are simply a continuation of this act, the ones particularly extending or affecting the time of prohibition being those of May 5, 1892 (27 Stat. L., p. 25), and April 29, 1902 (32 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 176).

With this state of facts as to the treaties and laws, the question before us is simple, and may be summed up as follows:

The treaties provide for the free admission of Chinese in the absence of certain specific findings of fact by the Government of the United States. It is proposed that the Congress shall repeal the laws containing such findings. Immediately upon this action being taken we revert to the condition which existed immediately consequent upon the signing of the Burlingame treaty of 1868, the modification proposed to that treaty by the treaty of 1880 and itself dependent upon the action of the Government of the United States not being invocable because of the failure of the Government to act or, more strictly speaking, because of the revocation by the Government of the United States of its former action. The conclusion, therefore, is irresistible that if the pending bill becomes enacted in its present form, the right of Chinese to come to this country will be absolutely unrestricted.

We do not discuss the meaning of the qualifying words "unless otherwise provided for by treaties, conventions, or by agreements as to passports" in their relations to Japanese immigration. This for the reason that although it has become public property that passport understandings exist between the United States and Japan controlling the coming of Japanese laborers to the United States. Such passport agreements have never officially been made public property, and in this sense legislation with respect to them is legislation in the dark, so far as the general public may be concerned.

If, however, the idea is to remain in any shape, it might be embodied as follows:

"Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may recognize the possession of Japanese passports as entitling the proper holder thereof to admission."

Very respectfully, yours,

RALSTON, SIDDONS & RICHARDSON.

This phrase is not to be found in my bill, as the gentleman would know if he had ever read it. I defy him to find the phrase. I challenge any Member of this House or any person to contend for a minute that my bill in excluding all persons ineligible to naturalization does not go further than existing exclusion acts. The gentleman from Alabama must himself be the victim of a joker or was confused when, in an amateurish way under the cover of a supposed dying congressional session, he fired his shot. When the gentleman talked, or rather wrote into his speech of June 19, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD August 24, those words which were absolutely foreign to his argument on that 19th of June in favor of a larger immigration station at Baltimore in order that more immigrants might be brought in at a southern port—when he wrote those sentences into his remarks about me and my bill he was stating, what was to say the least, a misconception, for he said my bill would let in the Chinese.

He is woefully mistaken, and has predicated his attack not on my bill nor the original Senate bill, but on an amendment to the phrase excluding persons ineligible to become citizens, that provided: "Unless otherwise provided for by treaties, conventions, or by agreements as to passports." I admit that were such a phrase in my bill following the other it would result in repealing the law, so far as absolute exclusion is concerned, and place the discretionary power in the hands of the President to exclude or not to exclude. But there is no such phrase in my bill. It was some such phrase the State Department endeavored to have me accept as an amendment to my bill, but I wrote them in February saying I believed in Chinese exclusion, and that I did not believe in going halfway about it or giving the Executive any discretionary power in the premises, preferring to strengthen rather than to weaken our present exclusion laws. The gentleman from Alabama is altogether mistaken—is in absolute error—when he says my bill would let down the bars to the Chinese. It would not. It would put them up. He has evidently not read my bill. He has probably taken some one's suggestion without looking into the chronological order of this immigration legislation, with which he ought to be entirely familiar. I challenge the gentleman to find the phrase attributed to me and my bill. I call upon him to point it out now and here. He can not do it. I have the bills here. I have the bill I introduced. I have the bill that was reported to the Senate. I have the bill that was first introduced by Senator DILLINGHAM. I have the bill that was reported after it had been recommitted, February 14, and that is the amendment the gentleman is apparently talking and thinking about and under which he has covered his assaults upon me. That bill and the next reprint of it are the ones. The amendments in those bills are not contained in my bill, and correspondence with the State Department, had in January and February, shows that I refused to put or agree to have put in my bill the words which might have given the President discretion to let the bars down to the Chinese.

Mr. Speaker, I think I know what ails the gentleman from Alabama and why he inserted thoughts in his speech of June 19, which was published in Saturday's RECORD, which he did not have in the June remarks. Just one week ago to-day the gentleman assured me, in regard to an inquiry on this floor, which is in the RECORD, that the immigration bill, which he asked to have passed over and not considered, would be reached and considered this session. Mr. Speaker, I did not then believe it would be, and so intimated; and it has not. I secured permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and did extend them, criticizing the gentleman for his failure to press immigration legislation, and quoted Members on his side of the House to show that there was what amounted, in my opinion, to an understanding to suppress any consideration of immigration restriction this session and probably its ultimate defeat next session.

I was absolutely right in my opinion and the gentleman's assurance then given me has proved to be worthless and wrong. That arrangement may work and it may not. My Democratic friends may catch the foreign vote and they may not. To my mind, questions of state and one as transcendent as this should not turn on any such practical politics. This Democratic House should have had the courage and risen to the patriotic level that inspired and actuated the Republican Senate when on the 19th of last April it passed this Dillingham immigration commission bill. Two years ago the gentleman from Alabama was unsparing in his denunciation of the Republicans then in control of this House for not considering immigration legislation, even though the congressional commission, of which he was a member, had not finished its work, and said that he did not consider that fact or any other sufficient reason for not considering such legislation in view of the alarming immigration evils. No such excuse exists to-day. The commission of which he was a member has reported. The Senate has passed its bill, but the gentleman from Alabama, in charge of immigration affairs of this House, has not brought this bill up for consideration. He has not raised his voice with other Democratic Members of this body in criticism of the suppression of this legislation. Therefore my criticism directed to him as the responsible chairman, being free from any personal feeling or invective, was altogether warranted and did not justify the strictures indulged in by the gentleman in his retort. What is the influence or interest that has prevented the consideration of these bills? What is the mystery that envelops this whole business, anyway? I have seen some telegrams and other data which might in part explain, but I am not going into these matters now. But time will tell and the mysteries attending the stranglehold which has anchored these bills in committee or at the foot of the calendar will be unveiled.

The gentleman's assurance, given me in answer to my question a week ago, as to whether the immigration bill, then withdrawn, would be passed, was that in his opinion it would be. I do not think that I am guilty of going too far by saying that I was disappointed—I hope that is moderate enough—that the bill has not been passed. I only trust that the promises of the Democratic Party might be ultimately fulfilled next December, and that the gentleman from Alabama may have all credit for any labor and effort in behalf of this immigration legislation. No one will write a more exalted editorial for his newspaper than I will, or anybody who is interested in relieving this country of this awful condition.

I just recently received a letter from a brother in Connecticut—and I am sorry that my colleague from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who has much to say on these questions, is not here. My brother in his letter told me he knew of a gentleman who had walked the streets of New Haven a distance of three squares, inquiring of every gentleman he met where the courthouse was, and no one could answer him in those three squares except a colored man, an American. I trust that gentlemen on the other side who are not familiar with conditions in Pennsylvania might enact this proposed legislation. I trust and want to believe that you are sincere, and that it may be a good thing for you to eliminate it from politics at the present time, and that next year the Dillingham bill, or the Burnett bill, or some bill, may go through promptly and without opposition, and that the results will be just as we anticipated and hoped for.

In conclusion, I trust I may always be the good-natured gentleman described by my friend from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL], and that no man may do more or try to do more in this cause than I; but at the same time I shall always resent the impeachment of anybody, either the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] or anybody else, if necessary to reach the truth, which is all I have been trying to do to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have unanimous consent for time to conclude my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had better fix a limit.

Mr. BURNETT. Say, 20 minutes. I have not prepared my speech on Sunday and have no essay to read, but will make it as brief as I can.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the essay of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] with a great deal of interest, and I am sorry that any gentleman made the point of order as to the language that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] was using; because while I do not desire the name of one who bandies billingsgate with anyone versed in that line of argument, I would have been very glad to have had the opportunity at least to have replied in kind.

The gentleman has referred to the fact that on the 19th of June, in the discussion of the Baltimore immigration matter, I asked to extend my remarks in regard to this question of immigration. That is true, and perhaps the statements that I have made in regard to the gentleman's bill would not have appeared in my speech but for the fact that on the 19th day of this month he asked to extend his remarks in the RECORD, late in the session, as everybody knew, when the RECORD was cumbersome and cumbered, and it was not expected that people would read the RECORD much, and he slipped into the RECORD a speech by the unanimous-consent process that he has so much deprecated in me. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a few of the remarks of the gentleman in that speech which was never delivered, especially those directed against me. On page 12329 of the RECORD he says, in referring to the report of the Immigration Commission:

> The official investigating body created by Congress and composed of Congressmen, that was conducting its inquiry two years ago, has made its report, and that report is now available.
> The Republican Senate of this Congress has acted. Its Committee on Immigration reported the 18th of last January an excellent bill, 58 pages long, that had been drawn by the experts of that commission and which contained practically every piece of legislation recommended by that commission.

Now, I would like very much to have the gentleman inform me what expert of that commission drafted that bill. The commission expired last January a year ago. There were no experts that I knew anything about. If there has been experts, certainly as a member of that commission, if it is true that the experts drew the gentleman's bill, I ought to have had that action by the expert submitted to me, but the experts upon whom the gentleman relies never did that, and I do not know to this day that it is a bill drawn by any expert. I deny it, and I think when I read something from the bill you will say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that it was an amateur who drew it and not an expert.

It was on the 18th of January that the Committee on Immigration of the Senate reported the bill. The gentleman complains of the committee of which I have the honor of being chairman about the delay that we made in the reporting of the Dillingham bill. That bill was never reported by the Senate until Congress had been in session a month and a half, and when it was reported, although our commission had recommended that the most feasible manner of restricting undesirable immigration was by the reading and writing test, and although there were two members of that commission on the Senate Committee on Immigration, in some way—I do not charge that the gentleman had anything to do with that—that bill was reported with the illiteracy test stricken out entirely, and for that reason it simply amounted to nothing, so far as its restrictive elements were concerned.

Now, how long did the Senate hold it? I desire to contrast the time within which our committee took action upon it and the time that the Senate itself took action. Although when the bill was passed there were only 8 or 10 against it, yet it was not until April 19 that that Senate bill passed, and on April 20 it came to our committee.

The gentleman states that we gave audience to representatives of steamship companies and others who were opposed to restriction of immigration. We gave three days to those who were opposing the Root amendment and to those who were in favor of the Root amendment and those who were opposed to a clause in the Dillingham bill which required that certificates should be provided to people upon their landing. I stated to the speakers before our committee, although occasionally they would break over, that already we had reported what was known as the Burnett bill, which stood straight by the illiteracy test, and that that question should not be discussed; and it seems to me that is the only way we could really do it, if they really desired to restrict immigration. Some months before that time the Burnett bill had been reported, on April 16.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. What was the Root amendment, to which the gentleman made reference?

Mr. BURNETT. I have it here, but I will give the gentleman the amendment in substance. It was one which allowed the deportation of aliens who were in this country and who were trying to organize strenuous opposition to organized government. That is substantially it. There was much opposition to it. There were members of the committee who believed that if the Root amendment were adopted and people, without trial by jury or trial by courts, merely upon the ipse dixit of the immigration inspector, were deported, then the Russian rulers would have their spies all over this country, and they would trump up charges against people from that country, some of them probably splendid Jewish people, and without trial they would be deported for the purpose of having condign punishment meted out to them on the other side. There were many members of the committee who did not believe that amendment ought to be passed. The other proposition required that those who came to this country to land should be compelled to have an identification certificate. That was opposed by many people, and before us we had the distinguished commissioner of immigration from Ellis Island, where most of these people come. That gentleman stated, and it is in the RECORD, that if any such thing as that were required these people would lose the certificate before they got outside of the building, and it would be absolutely useless and perhaps make trouble for many a poor fellow who could not produce it. Those were the two things mainly on which we held the hearings. The gentleman says it was the representatives of the steamship company that appeared before us. I am not in touch or in the confidence of the steamship companies and hence can not say, as the gentleman seems to speak from knowledge or some information that he relies upon, that it was the steamship companies that appeared before us.

Let me read what he says in regard to it:

> The immigration committee of the Republican Senate industriously considered the bill, while the gentleman's committee as industriously pigeonholed the very same immigration bill which I myself introduced and had referred to the gentleman's committee seven months ago, as I have said, and where my measure still remains unconsidered and unreported to this day.

Mr. Speaker, I am going directly to call attention to the gentleman's bill and then see whether that committee did not do right, especially in view of the fact that the gentleman never thought enough of his bill to ask for a hearing upon it. He talked to me a time or two in regard to whether immigration legislation would be reported, but never cared enough for his bill to ask for its consideration. Already the bill which I introduced had been reported, and I immediately filed a resolution asking for a rule to have it considered by the House, and when the Dillingham bill was considered for several days, on motion of a gentleman—I shall not say who he was, though I do not think he would object—the unanimous opinion of those who were in favor of restriction was that the Dillingham bill should be stricken out, after the enacting clause, and the Burnett bill should be reported in its place.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I presume the gentleman refers to me?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman is correct in his statement. I have no objection to his referring to me.

Mr. BURNETT. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts. No one can question the sincerity or the interest of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who has fought with me for years and years to try and secure restrictive legislation. It seemed best, in order to expedite the legislation that all after the enacting clause of the Dillingham bill should be stricken out and that the Burnett bill should be reported. When that was done I again introduced a resolution before the Committee on Rules asking that what my distinguished friend has been kind enough to denominate the Burnett-Dillingham bill might be taken up in order that consideration might be given to it. I urged members of the Rules Committee to report the bill. There were gentlemen upon each side of the House, and I believe I am safe in saying as many Republicans as Democrats in proportion to the numbers of each, who asked me to allow the bill to be passed over until the next session of Congress. I said to them that I was in favor of passing the bill at this session, and I wanted the Committee on Rules to give me a rule, and that if my Committee on Immigration were reached on any Calendar Wednesday I would be there, as I have been here every Calendar Wednesday and stayed through until the gavel fell at the end of the day, for the purpose of trying to get that bill and place it upon its passage.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Upon whom does the responsibility rest, if it may be termed responsibility, for failure to pass the Burnett bill during this session?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I think that the responsibility rests just where it did two years ago, when there was a similar failure, when the Republican Party was in power—upon the Rules Committee. We could not get a rule for its consideration.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Then the only difference is that at this time the responsibility is upon the Democratic Committee on Rules and that before it was upon the Republican Committee on Rules.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the way I look at it; yes. I am not defending the Committee on Rules, and I have not done so. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me read you along here again. The gentleman goes on and says——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; if I can get more time.

Mr. RAKER. I do not want to inject any outside matter at this time, but I do wish to ask a question of the chairman of the committee at this time. I have been industrious and diligent in appearing before his committee, I have appeared most every time they met, and particularly before the subcommittee, upon a bill (H. R. 13500) having for its purpose the exclusion of all Asiatic laborers. That bill went to the immigration commissioner, and was reported back favorably with the exception, which stated that the general exclusion was a question of policy for the Government, but the adminstrative features of the bill were perfect. Now, I want to ask, if I am entitled to ask, upon whom does the responsibility rest that the subcommittee having in charge my bill, with whom I have so persistently worked that I almost became a bore to the committee, for its failure to report to the full committee or to the Congress upon that bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question of the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, there was a subcommittee——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about the bill or the committee to which the gentleman refers. I do not know who the subcommittee were, but I believe by the rules of this House a Member is prohibited from stating what happens in a committee.

The SPEAKER. There is certainly no doubt about that.

Mr. RAKER. Do I understand from that that I am not entitled to the information? If that is the case, of course I will not insist on an answer.

The SPEAKER. That is undoubtedly the rule.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, that being the rule I am not going to ask to violate any rule of this House when I can avoid it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to shift any responsibility upon any member of a subcommittee or anyone else. I suppose it is permissible for me to state my views in regard to the matter without any reflection whatever on my part toward other gentlemen. The bill of which the gentleman speaks would exclude all Asiatics. We have a treaty that was made, I believe, in 1907 by which the Japanese are almost entirely being excluded. The records of the Commissioner General of Immigration show that within the last two years' time only about 2,000 Japanese have come in each year and more than 5,000 have gone out. That being true, I stated to the committee that I believed that at this time it would be better, unless that condition was acute or grew to be acute, when 3,000 had gone out in the last two years more than had come in, that it certainly was not an acute condition as far as they were concerned, and as we already had a Chinese-exclusion act which kept Chinese out, and the educational test would keep out a great many of the 2,000 coming in—I mean coming in lawfully; I am not talking about those smuggled over the border, because that is illegal, and it is not within the provision of the law as it stands now to permit them to come in—and hence I believe it would be better to postpone that legislation for a year or two, unless conditions were more acute, as far as the Japs were concerned.

Now, I want to read further from the gentleman's speech. He complains and uses harsh epithets, to which I should reply but for the fact that I have too much respect for gentlemen in this House and the rules of this House to violate the rules of the House by replying in terms as I would have done, perhaps, if it were not for those rules.

The SPEAKER. Well, it has been agreed that all these harsh epithets shall be stricken out of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to read what the gentleman said in criticism of Mr. POU, of the Rules Committee. He said:

> But I want to remind such gentlemen, and particularly the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], who is now on the Rules Committee, that his committee and the Immigration Committee are absolutely responsible for the failure of this House to consider immigration legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I carry no brief in defense of the Rules Committee, or any other committee than my own, but any charge or insinuation that the Committee on Immigration has tried to stifle this legislation or prevent the passage of this legislation is untrue and unjustifiable and not based upon the facts. Mr. Speaker, when you go into a court of equity you ought to go in with clean hands. Why could not the gentleman have taken advantage of a Wednesday when he could have had an hour in which to have made the speech from which I have quoted.

When the bill to keep out deserting alien seamen was called, I asked that it be passed for the present. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked for what reason. I said because it was thought that there may be serious conflict between it and the bill that was reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and passed the House, in regard to imprisonment of seamen, and we wanted to look into that. We have secured an amendment. It is a close question, Mr. Speaker, and must be carefully considered and carefully revised, and not amateurishly revised, and we have been considering it, and believe we have reached what will be an amendment that will not be in conflict with that wise bill. And I would be glad to call it up if I could call that up and get it passed. Mr. MANN said the reason was proper.

The gentleman could have had his hour on that Wednesday if he had desired it, but he has slipped into the RECORD a charge that I and the committee over which I preside are responsible for the defeat of this legislation. I believe that his bill repeals the Chinese-exclusion act, and I want to call attention to that section of the bill. The last section of his bill does that. It is section 39:

> SEC. 39. That this act shall take effect and be enforced from and after July 1, 1912. The act of March 26, 1910, amending the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; the act of March 3, 1903, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof—

Here comes what is a repeal of the Chinese exclusion law—

> all laws relating to the exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, except such provisions thereof as may relate to the naturalization of aliens; and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act.

He says the provision in section 3 of his bill saves him from the criticism that I have made to it. Let us see if it does. It is the long section. It says:

> SEC. 3. That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, and insane persons.

And so forth.

A semicolon appears after all those classes. Going over on the next page, he says:

> All male aliens 16 years of age or over, who are physically capable of reading and writing, but who are unable to read and write in some language or dialect, such aliens to be tested in this regard in accordance with methods and rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, but an admissible alien may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, or a son not over 18 years of age, otherwise admissible, whether said father or grandfather or son are able to read and write or not.

Those are the excepted classes. Then comes a full stop—a period—and then there is a provision:

> This provision, however, shall not apply to citizens of Canada, Newfoundland, Cuba, the Bermudas, or Mexico, nor to alien residents of continental United States returning from foreign contiguous territory after a temporary sojourn therein, nor to aliens in continuous transit through the United States, nor to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii except as hereinafter provided, nor to aliens arriving in the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, but if any such alien, not having become a citizen of the United States, shall later arrive at any port or place of the United States on the North American Continent, the reading and writing requirement shall apply.

Those are the exceptions to it. Now he comes in after a semicolon, after a full stop before it, with—> persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization.

I would like to see any court give any other construction to this law that must be strictly construed. I would like to see an enunciation of those who should be kept out. It comes to a full stop, and then comes to a semicolon, and says:

> Aliens who are not citizens of the United States.

No court would say that that, disconnected as it is, has any reference to the fact that persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization are excluded. Now, you take that, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the specific repeal of the Chinese-exclusion law, and in the last section of this the exclusion law is repealed. The gentleman can not escape the proposition.

[The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted 15 minutes additional.]

Mr. BURNETT. In my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I criticized the gentleman for this:

And if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so affected or afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect or inability to read and write might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of this provision.

They have to have a mental examination to determine whether they can read and write. What do you think of that?

But the gentleman pleads the baby act by saying the printers interlarded that expression, and says he has something in the bill that makes it clear. If that be true, the gentleman could have made that change there and reintroduced this bill and put it on the calendar, and not subjected himself to the criticism ever since January 19. He boasts how long it has been here; and certainly the gentleman has not read it since, until I called his attention to the fact that he was asking that people who were subjected to a physical examination to tell whether they could read or write or not.

Now, there is another thing that I want to call attention to The gentleman's bill would admit those coming in from Canada, the Bermudas, Cuba, and Mexico—that is, he excepts those who are citizens of those countries. I suppose the gentleman did not take the time to examine into the fact that there are 18,000 or 19,000 Mexicans coming in every year, many of them being of the most vicious class of immigrants and over 40 per cent of them unable to read and write. Yet the gentleman would keep out those coming from Germany, and England, and Ireland, Scotland, and Scandinavia—any person coming from there—although there would be but few of them, and let in the Mexican.

In the speech of which the gentleman complains I show that not more than 1 per cent of those from the British Isles, and less than 1½ per cent of those from Scandinavian countries, and not more than 2 per cent of the Jewish people from Russia, and not more than 2 per cent of the Bohemians, Jews, and French would be excluded.

The gentleman is willing that it shall be applied to them, but here Mexico sends some of the most vicious people who ever cross our borders, and the gentleman wants to throw open the gates of our country and let these people come in here and make war against organized government. [Applause.]

This is the bill of the gentleman. And not only that, but I do not suppose the gentleman knew the fact that Mexico allows the naturalization of the Chinese, and how easy, then, it would be for them to effect an entrance here! The gentleman rises in indignation against the imputation that his bill would let in the Chinese, and yet the laws of Mexico are such that Chinese may be naturalized there, and the gentleman by allowing the Chinese to come into Mexico and stay the requisite time for naturalization, would then allow them lawfully to come across our borders.

That is the gentleman's bill, Mr. Speaker. I do not care what attorney prepared it, I do not care whether it was the work of an expert or not. I deny that fact, because the members of the commission ought to have had some notice of the fact that such an enormity was attempted to be perpetrated upon them as this bill seeks to perpetrate. Those are the plain facts, and any lawyer who had ever looked into a law book ought to realize the danger of it and guard against it.

The framers of the Dillingham bill did realize the danger there, and there was inserted at the end of section 3, I believe, what is still an obscure statement of the fact that the Chinese are sought to be excluded from the operation of the provision applying to those who can come in at all. In other words, the repeal of the Chinese-exclusion law ought to be avoided.

Now, then, I am not here, Mr. Speaker, to defend the Senate. Those distinguished gentlemen who inserted in the Dillingham bill the exception that allows those to come in under the provisions of passports may be able to give their reason for doing that. As I said a moment ago, as far as the Japanese coming to this country are concerned, but few of them would be affected either way, and the illiteracy test, if that could be passed, which was left out in the committee of the Senate, would exclude, in my judgment, the greater part of them.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that about 90 per cent of the Japanese that enter the United States can read and write?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think the records show that.

Mr. RAKER. That is my understanding.

Mr. BURNETT. The reports of the commissioner general will show what the fact is.

Mr. CANDLER. Does the gentleman mean that they can read and write English?

Mr. BURNETT. No. No; they are not required to read and write English.

Mr. RAKER. As I understand, the Dillingham bill does not require that they shall be able to read and write English, but just that they shall be able to read and write some language. Is not that right?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have covered the ground. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] says that I never saw this in his bill until my attention was called to it by some attorney of a steamship company. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not care where I got my information. His statement is not true to start with, and I will elaborate that after a little. But I am not so stolid or so set that I will not take information from any source, if it is correct information. The fact is that the gentleman's bill was never referred to during the time of the discussion of the Dillingham bill. No attorney, no agent, no individual ever made any reference to it, except that Judge SABATH at one time, realizing that the gentleman was in the room—I did not notice his presence up to that time—asked him if he had anything to say in regard to his bill, and he did not ask to be heard.

I think the gentleman comes in with poor grace, when he has attacked me in the manner that he has, and then attacked the manner in which I replied to him. He is unjust and incorrect in his attack. I would brand it with different language, Mr. Speaker, but for my reverence and respect for the rules of this House. I have stated the case. If the gentleman can make anything out of that, he is at liberty to make as much as he cares to, but those are the stern and stubborn facts, and there his bill stands and there the result will stand. [Applause.] Without doubt his bill repeals the Chinese exclusion act.

I thank the House for its attention.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, reported the Senate bill quite a while ago?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember the date.

Mr. BURNETT. I can give the gentleman the date. It was reported June 7.

Mr. MANN. And also reported his own bill, a House bill, on the same subject.

Mr. BURNETT. Prior to that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman states, and I accept any statement which he makes, that he has made every diligent effort to get the bills up for consideration.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman, then, thoroughly convinced that under the new reform rules of the House, which I see referred to nearly every day in some speech as having been reformed so that business can come before the House when gentlemen desire it to come—is the gentleman convinced that these reform rules have been so well reformed, when the chairman of an important committee of the House, with a very important bill in charge, is yet unable after the most diligent effort, extending over months, to get it before the House for consideration?

Mr. BURNETT. No; I think there ought to be some further reforms. [Applause.] I think what they have is a very great reform over what was the condition when the gentleman's party was in power.

Mr. MANN. In what respect, as to the immigration bill?

Mr. BURNETT. In regard to these Calendar Wednesdays, which came in perhaps by force of circumstances toward the end of the Republican control of this House, I believe it is wrong that one committee should have two days on Calendar Wednesday and then go on with indefinite debate afterwards. I believe there ought to be some reform there in regard to Calendar Wednesday, so that one committee should not occupy that day for two Wednesdays and then continue indefinite debate afterwards. I think that is one of the reforms that is still needed.

Mr. MANN. Under the old rules of the House, and, for that matter, under the existing rules, it is in order every day to call the calendar of committees; in fact, that is the regular order under the rule. Since the reform of Calendar Wednesday was instituted it is not very often that the Speaker can possibly get the opportunity of proceeding to a call of the calendar. That has not worked very effectively in getting the gentleman's bill before the House.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama a question?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman think——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may have two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If this Calendar Wednesday rule were to be amended so as to allow only two hours' general debate on a separate bill, does not the gentleman think we then would have a true reform? I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that as the Calendar Wednesday rule was originally proposed to this House it provided that only three hours should be allowed in general debate on each bill and that I myself this year have introduced a resolution which is sleeping in the files of the Committee on Rules confining general debate on any bill brought up on any Calendar Wednesday to two hours.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Answering that question, I will say I believe there ought to be some amendment. As to whether the two-hour rule would be the correct one or not, I am not here to say, but I think there ought to be some limit to it.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that even on as great a bill as the immigration bill, which is not by any means the greatest bill that has ever come before the House the House ought to be restricted in general debate to two hours or that upon some great measure the House ought to be restricted by the rules to two hours' debate, when if it is on the House Calendar that is the end of all debate, because there is no five-minute debate on bills on the House Calendar.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to correct the gentleman in one thing. His resolution is not sleeping in the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ought not to have stated that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I wish to say I am heartily in favor of the gentleman's resolution, and if there is any one reform that ought to be brought about in this House in regard to the rules it is the one limiting time for debating these bills on Calendar Wednesday, and I hope that both sides of the House, Republican and Democratic alike, will insist that debate be limited to two hours upon these bills on Calendar Wednesday, and then if very important matters come up upon that day, and more time be needed, we can always find a way to consider such a bill in some way.

Mr. MANN. How?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have suggested in that rule to which the gentleman referred that by a two-thirds vote of the House the time for general debate may be extended. I think that safeguards the opportunity for reasonable debate. The gentleman from Illinois asked the gentleman from Alabama whether he did not think two hours much too short a time in which to consider the immigration bill. I call both gentlemen's attention to the fact that only three hours were allowed on June 25, 1906, when the great fight came upon immigration. This time was allowed not for general debate alone but for reading and debating the 45 sections of the bill as well.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman approve it?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. MANN. And now the gentleman seeks to make it two hours.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. What I disapproved was the rule which made it impossible to get a yea-and-nay vote upon the amendments adopted.

Mr. MANN. There will be no yea-and-nay vote on amendments on a bill that is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is that on Calendar Wednesday now under the rule a majority of the House can terminate debate at any time.

The SPEAKER. All of this debate is out of order.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, now that the time of the gentleman from Alabama has been extended, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. Is it not a fact that under the rules of the House at the present time a majority of the House can close general debate or limit it to any time it desires on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. There has never been a time when a majority, if it wished to conceal its views on any particular question, could not do so by voting to consider something else. There is not a doubt that the Members of this House, by refusing to close debate, could conceal from their constituents the fact that they desired to avoid going on record on an awkward bill. That is what I object to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not an answer to the question at all.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I want to make the closure of debate automatic unless extended by a two-thirds vote of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman wants an automatic rule limiting the time for debate on bills which under the rule now come up under special conditions, and, regardless of the merits or the conditions, he wants to have the most effective gag rule ever designed to force legislation through the House.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Possibly, under certain circumstances. Here we have been for the last few weeks on Calendar Wednesday trying to avoid the consideration of the immigration bill. Why? Not because a majority of the House is opposed to the bill, but because a majority does not want the bill to come up. Whichever way men vote, they fear they may get into trouble.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's purpose is to make it impossible to debate bills that Members wish to debate in order to make it possible to reach the bill which he insists a majority of the House is anxious to pass but does not want to consider.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Members of the House avoid going on record for or against a particular bill by voting to consider some other bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I think the gentleman exaggerates matters. All the Members of this House act about the same.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; I plead guilty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Neither the gentleman nor myself conduct ourselves any differently on these matters from other gentlemen.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. For administrative reasons our immigration restrictions are relaxed as to either Canada or Newfoundland. We know that it would be highly inconvenient and probably of no practical effect to enforce an illiteracy test on passengers who travel daily on the ferryboats in and out of Detroit, for instance. Hundreds of trains cross the Canadian border every day. I have never believed and I do not now believe that it is wise to impose an illiteracy test against Canadians. Nevertheless, I raise no objection to including Canada in the operation of the illiteracy test, if that will help to pass the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think if the gentleman wants a bill of that sort he ought not to let in the illiterates from Canada, so as to continue the distressful and horrifying conditions in the New England mills we have been hearing so much about.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Canada sends us practically no illiterates.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. There has been more or less said this morning in reference to a limitation of time of debate on Calendar Wednesday. Of course, you might as well limit it on every other day if you limit it on Calendar Wednesday, because you can call up on Calendar Wednesday any bill that is on the calendar which is not a revenue bill or an appropriation bill, practically speaking.

Here is a serious proposition urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] apparently acquiesced in by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, that there ought to be in the rules a limitation of debate upon great measures. The gentleman from Massachusetts himself just now is a living illustration of his opposition to closing debate when attacked in the last speech. He would not be willing to have two hours' only general debate upon the immigration bill if he could not have part of the time and somebody should attack his propositions on immigration. I have often noticed in the House that when gentlemen become thoroughly infatuated with some particular bill that they would like to close general debate until that bill is passed if they can control the time that is allowed on general debate on the bill. But I believe that the rules ought always to provide that a small minority of the House on great public questions should have the opportunity of being heard in general debate. The rules now authorize a majority of the House to close debate at once upon a House calendar bill by operation of the previous question, and whenever they please upon a Union Calendar bill by a vote of the House. Here we have had up this year or have on the calendar a bill for Philippine independence, a bill providing for a general government in the Philippine Islands, the immigration bill, and we will have the compensation bill, which is not yet on the calendar, although it ought to be, and a serious proposition being urged that the House shall limit debate by the rules for two hours, subject, of course, I believe, to two-thirds of the House giving a larger time, but absolutely foreclosing the right of a small minority to have any time in general debate. We have seen how that operates when we come to debate upon a question. The chairman of the committee or the gentleman in charge of a bill is entitled to the first hour. Nominally, somebody in opposition to the bill is entitled to the next hour. As a matter of fact, a member of the minority of the committee is recognized for the second hour; and if one member of it will state that he is opposed to the bill at all he is entitled to the hour under the practice of the House, and no outside Member is entitled to any time if the time is to be cut so short.

I do not believe in a reform of the rules which provides that the consideration of measures must take place in the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol and can not take place in the House of Representatives. [Applause.] If there is any one thing that has largely destroyed the influence of the House of Representatives in the popular mind it is the fact that we pass bills of great public importance often with little or no debate, and then they go to the Senate, where they are often thoroughly debated, and generally in that respect changed entirely, and come back to the House, where we either send them to conference, and then have no debate upon the measures at all in the House, or agree to the Senate amendments with very little debate. There are many ways now of limiting debate. There are many ways of extending debate. Gentlemen may make rules from now until the end of time, and there never will be found a method of preventing delay where a majority of the House body desire delay. You may shut off general debate. You may do what you please in reference to that, but you will not expedite the consideration of measures to which a majority of the body is opposed in this or any other legislative body. I protest against the proposition that the House shall adopt a rule which will prevent proper consideration of great public measures.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I just came into the Chamber and directly or indirectly the subject of immigration seems to be talked about. It has been a good deal talked about in the last few years. I have very pronounced views upon it, and I have no desire to conceal them. I have no desire to avoid responsibility for any action as a Member of this House that I have ever taken heretofore or now.

There are about 350,000,000 people of our race—the Caucasian race—engaged in one occupation and another in Europe. My forebears, scattered around in various countries, finally landed in this country a little over a century ago. I am glad they came. I do not know whether they could read and write or not. Whatever this generation that I belong to of my family may amount to, for two generations at least they were people who lived in the sweat of their faces. They were Caucasians; they were good citizens; they contributed to the development and the betterment of our civilization.

Now, we have got less than 100,000,000 of people in the United States. When we are as thickly settled as Europe is, we will have from 400,000,000 to 500,000,000. Thus far we have just scratched the surface of this country. There come to this country about a million immigrants a year, those who are permitted to come. I have voted for Chinese exclusion because, with the habits of the Chinese and the manner of their living, we can not sustain our civilization and compete with them.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I would rather not, because I have only five minutes. I do not want to talk long.

Now, about a million, as I say, on the average, come every year, people of substantially our race, people who are willing to live in the sweat of their faces. I would rather have, if need be, a thousand or ten thousand men come that can not read and write who are willing to work and help matter assume shape that is useful to the human family, than to have a hundred come that can read and write and who seek to live by "black-hand" operations or otherwise in the sweat of somebody else's faces; and therefore I protest against that illiteracy qualification.

I can tell you how you can stop immigration to this country. You can do it by enacting laws that will cover all of the nearly 100,000,000 people in this country—laws that in their operation will decrease the wage or the compensation of the people, however employed, in the United States. This million a year comes—what for? For a better wage, for a better manner of living, for a better civilization; and the common schools take care of their children. The first generation, in the main, that works is pretty good, and the second generation is better, because they learn the language and learn our habits.

Now, if you will pursue the policy that will make it unprofitable for them to come they will not come. Now, as I am a little over a century old in this country—a little over, about a century and 12 years—I have no sympathy with the men who come in this generation from Europe, and in the second generation or any other generation will say, "We will pursue a policy that will stop immigration, because we want to get rid of that competition here. When you pursue that policy, you come into competition with 350,000,000 people, substantially of the Caucasian race. I would rather have a million a year, who labor in Europe and ship their products to this country, come as your forbears and my forbears came, and cast in their lot with us, shutting out the criminal, shutting out the dissolute, shutting out the diseased; I would rather have them come and help the coming generations to develop this country with liberty, and, as we increase in population, and as the hive swarms and goes out to other portions of North and South America, to work out their salvation; I would rather have them come than reduce our style of living and reduce our standard of compensation to the level of that of the Old World. Choose ye as your judgment warrants.

This is not a new doctrine for me. I have been attacked bitterly touching immigration. I have nothing to conceal. I have nobody to call hard names, but I do not see legislation as proper that other gentlemen do see. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, in connection with quite a number of Members of the House, I got permission to extend my remarks, but I find no mention of it in the RECORD. May I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the gentleman will be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DYER was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

CERTAIN REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House bill 15626, to provide for the proper deed of conveyance to real estate in the District of Columbia when the United States contributes to its purchase or condemnation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAKER). This does not require unanimous consent, does it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; this is District of Columbia day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter whenever any real estate is acquired, whether by purchase or condemnation, to be used, in whole or in part, by the municipal government of the District of Columbia, or any branch or department thereof, and the United States contributes to the purchase price thereof, the deed of conveyance therefor shall be made to the District of Columbia and the United States jointly, in the same proportion to which each has contributed toward its purchase or condemnation.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have the bill reported.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It has been read.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk read the original bill, but there is a committee amendment, and the bill is not reported until the committee amendment is reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That whenever any real estate heretofore or hereafter acquired by the District of Columbia toward the purchase price of which the United States contributed ceases to be used for the principal purpose for which it was acquired it shall be sold; and, when sold, the proceeds of sale shall be divided between the United States and the District of Columbia in the same proportion as each contributed to the purchase and improvement of same. Any improvements put upon any such real estate, as well as any fixtures or appurtenances thereunto belonging, shall be sold with the real estate, and the proceeds of sale shall be disposed of in exactly the same manner as the proceeds of sale of the real estate as above set out. The provisions of this act shall also apply to and include any property acquired as aforesaid, whether it be within or out of the said District of Columbia.

"The sale of said real property shall be made at public auction, in front of the Municipal Building, after having been advertised four times in a daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia, one week to intervene between each publication, the last publication to be made on the day before the sale, the sale to begin at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon; but the property shall not be knocked off or sold until 4 o'clock; that is, the sale is to be cried for 30 minutes. The property so sold shall be paid for as follows: One-third cash and the remainder in equal installments due 6 and 12 months after day of sale, the deferred payments to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from day of sale until paid, a lien to be reserved upon the property to secure the deferred payments. Other than the newspaper advertising, the expenses of the sale and conveyance to the purchaser shall not exceed $50.

"The deferred payments herein mentioned shall be evidenced by promissory notes, the total amount of which shall be divided between and executed to the United States and the District of Columbia according to the interest of each therein. The Secretary of the Treasury shall require such surety, in addition to the lien, upon the notes payable to the United States as he shall deem ample and sufficient; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall in like manner pass upon the sufficiency of the surety upon the notes payable to the District of Columbia. The purchaser may, upon his election to do so, pay cash instead of executing the promissory notes, or he may take up any of the deferred payments before maturity.

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall make the settlement of such accounts between the United States and the District of Columbia, and this settlement made by him shall be final."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the fact that this is a very extraordinary bill. It gives unusual powers to an official. Under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury could sell most of the parks in the District of Columbia to whose purchase the United States has contributed if he were to determine that they were no longer required for park purposes. I do not think at this time in the session a bill like this should be passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York is entirely mistaken in saying that any executive officer should dispose of the parts under this bill. The gentleman says this is a most extraordinary bill; it is, because it is a most unusual bill. The United States for years and years has contributed to the purchase of real estate in the District of Columbia, to be used exclusively by the District of Columbia. The school property now in the District amounts to about $10,000,000. There is other property to the extent of perhaps more than $5,000,000, to the purchase of all of which the United States Government has contributed to the extent of one-half. Now, it would certainly seem that no man could offer a reasonable objection to the proposition that when this property ceases to be used for the purpose for which it was required it may be sold and the money be distributed between the United States Government and the District of Columbia in the same proportion in which it was contributed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It might be most desirable to use the property for some other purpose. For instance, property may be used for a school for a good many years, and the school be abandoned, and then it might be highly desirable to erect a police station or an engine house upon the land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And Congress would have a perfect right to have that done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the Secretary of the Treasury could sell it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But for the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to get money from the Federal Government upon one guise and then use it in their discretion, without the interference of Congress, for another purpose, is wrong, and I say that somebody in Congress representing the interests of the United States Government in these matters should have the right to interpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can prevent that practice by reporting a bill which will prohibit property acquired for one purpose from being used for any other purpose unless Congress specifically authorizes it. But to place in any one individual officer the power——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This bill does not do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is how I caught the reading of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York caught it wrong.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then there is all the more reason why it should not be passed at this particular time under these circumstances.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. In the event this property in which the United States has an equal or certain proportion with the District of Columbia ceases to be used for the purpose originally intended, is it the purpose of the gentleman's bill to sell the property at auction?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and divide the money between the two interests purchasing.

Mr. BATHRICK. In the proportion in which they were originally interested.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield long enough for me to ask unanimous consent to have laid before the House a bill which just came over from the Senate, in order that it may be considered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would that interfere with the further consideration of this matter at this time?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7500. An act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes," approved July 22, 1912.

OKANOGAN, WASH.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider the bill (S. 7500) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes," approved July 22, 1912.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAKER). The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation, in the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes," approved July 22, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out in the first section thereof, in the description of the lands authorized to be sold, the word "twenty-three," after the word "township," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty-three."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given, I desire to explain to the House what it is. Recently the House passed a bill authorizing the sale of certain lands to the town of Okanogan for public-park purposes. When the bill was introduced the Department of the Interior recommended an amendment, giving the description of the property, and in that description it reads "section 17, township 23 north." It was put in the bill in that way and it is now discovered that it should be township 33 instead of 23.

Mr. GARRETT. This is a Senate bill?

Mr. MANN. Yes; and this is to correct it by making it read township 33 instead of 23.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The description is to make it apply to the property in question?

Mr. MANN. To the property in question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CERTAIN REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15626) to provide for the proper deed of conveyance in real estate in the District of Columbia when the United States contributes to its purchase or condemnation.

The question was taken.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 3.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts (during the counting). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I renew it. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for 30 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the House is not in session. I make the point of order that the House is not in session. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I object, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 15626 be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the bill has been reported.

The SPEAKER. Are there any amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The amendment also has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman if he desires to do so can make the point.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire merely to speak for five minutes on the subject which has been discussed here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that at the end of five minutes the House take a recess for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that at the end of five minutes the House take a recess for one hour.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I withdraw my point.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one request?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on H. R. 25738, H. R. 19344, and a bill which has just passed the Senate, S. 5068.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, and Mr. BUCHANAN were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested and amused at the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on the subject of immigration. He recited that there are 350,000,000 people of the Caucasian race in Europe who would be competing with American labor except for the tariff wall between us; that we have in this country approximately 100,000,000 of people; that he is opposed to any reduction of the tariff, or any considerable reduction of the tariff, but desires conditions maintained better in this country than they are in Europe through the protective tariff.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I never mentioned the protective tariff. If the gentleman desires to put words in my mouth in regard to my statement, well and good; but I will say to him now, I am in favor of the Republican policy of protection, and high enough to protect.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I understand the gentleman's views, but his argument is the same as to say that if you have two watering troughs by the side of each other, connected by a tube at the bottom, that you can fill one of them full of water and the water will not run into the other. So long as the people from Europe can come to the United States without restriction and conditions are better in this country, they will come, and there is no way by which conditions of labor can be kept to a higher standard here in the future than in European countries without restriction upon European immigration. If you are going to have unrestricted immigration from European countries in this manner, you can not by artificial methods, by a protective tariff or otherwise, maintain better conditions for labor in the United States than anywhere else——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me? I am not in favor of unrestricted immigration, but the name of the gentleman harks back to the same country to which I hark back—that is, Ireland. I do not know how old the gentleman's forbears are in this country, but the Irish seem to be able to get to Congress within a generation, and I am not surprised——

Mr. NORRIS. They go on the police force in the first generation and get into Congress in the second generation.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I have not said I was in favor of any additional restrictions upon immigration, but I have said that I was amused at the gentleman's argument. It is an absolutely impossible and an illogical one——

Mr. CANNON. Thank you.

Mr. LAFFERTY (continuing). To say that you can keep labor conditions in this country better than they are in foreign countries and permit foreigners to come in practically without restriction.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me? A million of them do come. Three hundred and fifty million of them, with cheap transportation, send their products without a protective policy. Is one million greater than three hundred and fifty million?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I am in favor of maintaining better conditions in the United States than any foreign countries if possible to do so, and I favor a reasonable protective tariff upon competitive articles. I also favor more rigid exclusion laws for the same reason.

I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] if he is here.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The gentleman evidently is not here. Yield it to me.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I will.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, some time ago, when the sundry civil bill was up, I presented some statements in reference to the Department of Justice. I would like the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD so as to present a brief summary of the work of the Committee on Expenditures in that department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. In connection with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] I ask also that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], my colleague, have unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LARCENY IN INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider in the House as in Committee of the Whole the bill H. R. 16450, reported from the Judiciary Committee unanimously, which is a bill to prevent larceny.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill to which he refers. The time has come under the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for a recess for one hour.

Mr. CARLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the House postpone that for one minute. This bill will not take longer than that.

Mr. MANN. It will take more than that. You can call it up after we meet again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can proceed after the recess.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may call it up after the recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will grant it, if the deficiency bill is not here, without any motion about it now.

Mr. MANN. That is, by asking unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. By asking unanimous consent.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 3.25 p. m. by the Speaker.

By unanimous consent, Mr. McCoy and Mr. Davis of West Virginia were granted leave to extend their remarks in the Record.

LARCENY IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider in the House as in the Committee of the Whole the bill H. R. 16450.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 16450. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Let us hear the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16450) to punish the unlawful breaking of seals of railroad cars containing interstate or foreign shipments, the unlawful entering of such cars, the stealing of freight and express packages or baggage or articles therefrom in process of transportation in interstate shipment, and the felonious exportation of such freight or express packages or baggage or articles therefrom into another district of the United States, and the felonious possession or reception of the same.

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall unlawfully break the seal of any railroad car containing interstate or foreign shipments of freight or express, or shall enter any such car with intent, in either case, to commit larceny therein; or whoever shall steal or unlawfully take, carry away, or conceal, or by fraud or deception obtain from any railroad car, station house, platform, depot, steamboat, barge, or wharf, with intent to convert to his own use any goods or chattels moving as, or which are a part of or which constitute, an interstate or foreign shipment of freight or express, or shall buy, or receive, or have in his possession any such goods or chattels, knowing the same to have been stolen; or whoever shall steal or shall unlawfully take, carry away, or by fraud or deception obtain, with intent to convert to his own use, any baggage which shall have come into the possession of any railroad company or other common carrier for transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or from a foreign country to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or shall break into, steal, take, carry away, or conceal any of the contents of such baggage, or shall buy, receive, or have in his possession any such baggage or any article therefrom of whatsoever nature, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall in each case be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both, and prosecutions therefor may be instituted in any district wherein the crime shall have been committed. The carrying or transporting of any such freight, express, baggage, goods, or chattels from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall constitute a separate offense and subject the offender to the penalties above described for unlawful taking, and prosecutions therefor may be instituted in any district into which such freight, express, baggage, goods, or chattels shall have been removed or into which they shall have been brought by such offender.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the amendments reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the word "barge" and insert the word "vessel" in lieu thereof.

Amend, page 2, lines 11 and 12, by striking out the words "railroad company or other."

On page 3, insert, after line 8, the following new section:

"SEC. 2. That nothing in this act shall be held to take away or impair the jurisdiction of the courts of the several States under the laws thereof; and a judgment of conviction or acquittal under the laws of any State shall be a bar to any prosecution hereunder for the same act or acts."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the proponent of the bill a question.

Mr. CARLIN. With pleasure, sir.

Mr. LAFFERTY. This bill fixes the punishment, as I understand from the reading, at not more than 10 years in the penitentiary or not more than $5,000 fine. Does the bill fix the full amount of stolen goods?

Mr. CARLIN. No.

Mr. LAFFERTY. There is no minimum fixed?

Mr. CARLIN. No minimum. Therefore it leaves the minimum to be as small as possible for the penalty. The penalty for a small offense could be made a day in jail, or not a day in jail, or a dollar fine. It leaves that discretionary.

Mr. LAFFERTY. What is the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. CARLIN. Well, it grows out of this fact, that if a train be in transit, passing from one State to another, and a larceny be committed, the prosecution can not be successfully had in the State unless you can fix the jurisdictional point. For instance, along the line between Virginia and North Carolina, in the case of a train passing between two States, if a larceny were committed on a moving train it is impossible to have a conviction.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Well, Mr. Speaker, several States have already passed laws, as I understand it——

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is mistaken——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Providing that an offense committed on a railroad train may be prosecuted in any county in the State; and to pass a law now which would permit the defendant or the accused to be taken from one State to another State, or even across an intervening State would possibly work an injustice.

Mr. CARLIN. This law remedies that, and allows the State courts to take jurisdiction.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtiss, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

House concurrent resolution 65.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of August, 1912, at 3 o'clock a. m.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 63.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 25,000 copies of the majority and minority reports of the committee authorized under House resolution 148, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890 and other acts, be printed for the use of the House, 15,000 to be distributed through the folding room and 10,000 through the document room.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

S. J. Res. 138. To pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States a sum equal to one-twelfth of their annual salaries in lieu of transportation and other expenses in coming to and returning from Washington for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. MANN. There was applause on the floor on the other resolution. There ought to be applause in the galleries on this.

HOUR OF FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution relating to adjournment may be laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a concurrent resolution in reference to the final adjournment, with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 65.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of August, 1912, at 3 o'clock a. m.

With the following amendments:

Line 5, strike out "twenty-fifth" and insert "twenty-sixth."

Lines 5 and 6, strike out "3 o'clock a. m." and insert "4.30 o'clock p. m."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Senate amendments to the resolution to adjourn be concurred in. I move to agree to the Senate amendments on the resolution to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Underwood] moves that the House concur in the Senate amendments to the adjournment resolution. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion to concur in the Senate amendments was agreed to.

LARCENY IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CARLIN. Now I will answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Lafferty]. I will say for the gentleman's information that this bill does not extend the jurisdiction from one State to another, but limits the jurisdiction within the district in which the offense is committed; that is, the district within the State. It simply extends it to the counties, but not to the States.

Mr. LAFFERTY. That is, the Federal courts?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; the Federal courts.

Mr. LAFFERTY. But it would not allow the Federal court in Illinois to try an offense committed in Missouri?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; and it does not allow an offense committed in the western district of a State to be tried in the eastern district of the same State.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I understand.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that there is no further objection to the bill, and I ask that it now be passed. I ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Carlin] asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. It is a House Calendar bill and does not require that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. CARLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ONE MONTH'S COMPENSATION—EMPLOYEES OF HOUSE AND SENATE.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I understood that the Senate had sent, together with the resolution to adjourn, an additional resolution, which provides for the payment of an additional month's pay to the employees of the House and the Senate. I ask that that resolution be taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that request for the present. I understand there is something under consideration with reference to it, which I did not know of when I made the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his request.

EXCHANGE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate bill (S. 5068) on the Speaker's table. The House Committee on the Public Lands has made a unanimous report upon a similar bill. I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and that it be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill referred to by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 5068) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, and for other purposes, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to make exchange of lands with the several States for those portions of the lands granted in aid of common schools, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, which lie within the exterior limits of any Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, the said exchange to be made in the manner and form and subject to the limitations and conditions of sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of February 28, 1891 (26 Stats., 796), and any such exchange whether heretofore or hereafter approved shall restore full title in the United States to the base land, without formal conveyance thereof by the State: Provided, That upon completion of the exchange the lands relinquished, reconveyed, or assigned as base lands shall immediately become a part of the reservation within which they are situate, and in case the same shall be found within the exterior limits of more than one reservation they shall become a part of that reservation which was first established: Provided further, That this act shall not be construed to authorize the approval of selections embracing lands withdrawn as mineral under the act of June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawals of public lands in certain cases" (36 U. S. Stat. L., pp. 847–848), until such lands have been found to be nonmineral and for that reason restored, but nothing herein contained shall prevent a limited approval, when the lands are within only a coal withdrawal, excluding from the approval coal deposits: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the State of Idaho.

Mr. BATHRICK. Reserving the right to object, what is this bill?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill permitting the State of California to adjust its rights. The Committee on the Public Lands have unanimously reported a similar bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. Is this a Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Has a similar bill passed the House?

The SPEAKER. A similar bill has been reported favorably by the House committee.

Mr. COOPER. Has an identical bill been reported by the House committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell.

Mr. RAKER. An identical bill is on the calendar, reported from the House committee with a favorable report.

Mr. COOPER. Is the bill identical?

Mr. RAKER. Identical, with one little amendment as to the discretion of the Secretary, and we saw the Secretary, and that amendment is satisfactory to him.

The SPEAKER. This bill must be considered in Committee of the Whole, anyway.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman from New York will not object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a time when legislation ought to be watched.

Mr. WILLIS. Is not this the bill to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objected the other day?

Mr. RAKER. When the House bill was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar the gentleman from Illinois objected and it went off the calendar. This bill has passed the Senate, and a similar bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on the Public Lands. The matter has been gone into fully and thoroughly by the Public Lands Committee of the House. The bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Attorney General of the United States, as well as the State attorney of California and the surveyor general.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of any land-exchange bill at the tail end of this session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

SUITS IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 23186) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 28 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 28. That any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, of which the district courts of the United States are given original jurisdiction by this title which may now be pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the district court of the United States for the proper district. Any other suit of a civil nature at law or in equity of which the district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction by this title and which are now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any State court may be removed into the district court of the United States for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein being nonresidents of that State. And when, in any suit mentioned in this section, there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the district court of the United States for the proper district. And where a suit is now pending or may hereafter be brought in any State court in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, any defendant being such citizen of another State may remove such suit into the district court of the United States for the proper district, at any time before the trial thereof, when it shall be made to appear to said district court that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court or in any other State court to which the said defendant may under the laws of the State have the right on account of such prejudice or local influence to remove said cause: Provided, That if it further appear that said suit can be fully and justly determined as to the other defendants in the State court without being affected by such prejudice or local influence and that no party to the suit will be prejudiced by a separation of the parties, said district court may direct the suit to be remanded so far as relates to such other defendants to the State court to be proceeded with therein. At any time before the trial of any suit which is now pending in any district court or may hereafter be entered therein and which has been removed to said court from a State court on the affidavit of any party plaintiff that he had reason to believe and did believe that from prejudice or local influence he was unable to obtain justice in said State court the district court shall, on application of the other party, examine into the truth of said affidavit and the grounds thereof, and unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of said court that said party will not be able to obtain justice in said State court it shall cause the same to be remanded thereto. Whenever any cause shall be removed from any State court into any district court of the United States, and the district court shall decide that the cause was improperly removed and order the same to be remanded to the State court from whence it came, such remand shall be immediately carried into execution, and no appeal or writ of error from the decision of the district court so remanding such cause shall be allowed: Provided further, That no case arising under an act entitled 'An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases,' approved April 22, 1908, or any amendment thereto, and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States: Provided further, That no suit against a corporation or joint stock company brought in a State court of the State in which the cause of action arose shall be removed to any court of the United States on the ground that the parties are citizens of different States if the suit is brought in the county where the cause of action arose or within the county where the defendant is served with process and the plaintiff resides."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he expects the House to consider and pass a bill of this complexity at this time in the session, after we have adopted a resolution for final adjournment?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know what the House will do. I have made the request.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I can inform the gentleman that it will not consider that.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement in respect to it?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtiss, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had receded from its amendments

Nos. 22, 33, 34, and 114 to the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution (S. Res. 387):

In compliance with the foregoing resolution the President pro tempore appointed as said committee Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed by the House to join a like committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses had concluded their business and are ready to adjourn report that they have performed the duty, and the President says he has no further communication to make.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD was granted to Mr. CANDLER and to Mr. WILSON of Illinois.

ENTRIES ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, on February 28, 1912, I addressed the House on the subject of entries on the public lands. In the course of my remarks I referred to the confidential reports made by special agents of the General Land Office. These reports are of the greatest importance to entrymen and are the subjects of the liveliest interest to all concerned in the settlement of the public lands and to all the public-land States.

Since the delivery of that speech the following order has been issued by the General Land Office, and I print the same with pleasure:

ORDER.

1. Where the record of a hearing on a special agent's adverse report is referred by "P" to another division for adjudication, the confidential file will be detached therefrom and placed in the "P" file.

2. Where a record is referred to another division for any action, and thereafter to be returned to "P," the confidential file will be detached and placed in file "P." "P" will retain docket card and place in "Pending elsewhere" file.

The confidential or secret reports referred to can not be seen by the entrymen or by any person or persons in their behalf. The above order means that hereafter no confidential report of a special agent is to be considered when any entry is being finally passed upon, and that hereafter no statement adverse to any entryman, to which the entryman has not been given opportunity to submit evidence in his own behalf, will be considered by the department in determining the merits of an entry.

Referring again to the subject of my remarks upon "Entries on the Public Lands," I am more confident than ever that entrymen should have the right of appeal to the courts from the decisions of the Department of the Interior upon their entries. I have a bill pending for this purpose, and investigation gives me reason to believe that this legislation will be enacted into law, and I earnestly hope that this will be done at a very early date. It is legislation greatly needed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtiss, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following joint resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 139. Joint resolution to pay the officers and employees of the Senate of the United States a sum equal to one-twelfth of their salaries in lieu of all transportation and other expenses in coming to and returning from Washington for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress.

SUITS IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], I will state that this is the exact legislation which passed this House during the last Congress as an amendment to the revision on the judiciary title. This legislation prevents the removal of causes brought in State courts against corporations chartered under the laws of other States to the Federal court upon the ground of diversity of citizenship of the corporation only. It is legislation with which I know, if the gentleman will refresh his memory, he is thoroughly familiar, because I know he and I have discussed it before. It is the exact legislation which passed this House at the last Congress as an amendment to the judiciary title, and is in the exact language in which it was finally agreed upon by the conferees.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I have entire confidence, as has the whole membership of the House, in the word of my friend from Tennessee, and yet I can not consent to the consideration of so important a measure at this time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to say this: It is reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will remember the legislation. The conferees on the revision bill fought over it here for two months and finally agreed upon it.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think that a proposition which necessitated a discussion between conferees extending over a period of two or three months should be taken up by this House with the very small membership that is here and passed in 5 or 10 minutes?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, Mr. Speaker, it was not the gist of the legislation that the conferees discussed, but the form in which it should be put. This House almost unanimously passed the legislation.

The language which I am using is the language which the conferees agreed upon. This is the effect of it: It will simply prevent the removal of causes from State courts to Federal courts that are brought by corporations on the ground of diversity of citizenship.

Mr. COOPER. It is a subject of very great importance, and the bill itself is one that I do not remember ever to have read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. I object.

EXTRA MONTH'S PAY.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 138, providing for an extra month's pay for the House and Senate employees.

The SPEAKER. If there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, quite a number of Members of the House, on Saturday night, when the differences between the two Houses on the deficiency bill were before the House, inquired of me whether the amendment in the deficiency bill respecting the extra month's pay would be agreed to, and upon assurances that it would not be agreed to or that legislation of that character would not go through at this session of Congress, they left the city. Under the circumstances I shall have to object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire in a Democratic House to say anything to embarrass anyone, but suspension of the rules is in order, and I want to say, without embarrassment to anyone, that after two sessions of Congress—almost a year, or over, if you count it that way—it does seem that simple justice would warrant this, without regard to what caucus action may have been taken under different conditions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, of course, is very ingenious; but this resolution can not be passed under suspension of the rules at this time in the session. The employees of this House were appointed and accepted their positions with the knowledge that the compensation fixed by law was the compensation that would be paid them, and that there would be no extra compensation paid.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. Would it be in order to move to suspend the rules and put the resolution upon its passage?

Mr. MANN. Not unless the gentleman is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. CARLIN. I am asking that question of the Speaker for information.

The SPEAKER. It would not do a particle of good to ask to suspend the rules, and it would not do any good for the Chair to recognize the gentleman, because here is the rule about suspensions:

No rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the Members voting, a quorum being present.

Of course the Chair will take official notice of the fact——

Mr. MANN. I hope the Chair will not make the announcement that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to embarrass the situation, but I am very anxious to have the resolution considered, and would like to ask leave to suspend the rules and put it on its passage.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman recognizes that suspension is wholly within the control of the Chair. No man can move to suspend the rules unless and until he is recognized by the Chair for that purpose.

Mr. CARLIN. I understand that. I am now asking to be recognized for the purpose of making the motion to suspend the rules and put the resolution upon its passage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman withhold the motion for a moment?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I was recognized, was I not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. But here is an amendment providing for 5 cents a mile each way——

The SPEAKER. That is not up for consideration at this particular time.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I asked for recognition, and I had the floor ahead of everybody else.

Mr. MANN. And I was on my feet before the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CARLIN. I had never left the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was up for some purpose, the Chair does not know what. [Laughter.]

STATEMENTS OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to give the House some information from the Committee on Appropriations concerning the appropriations made by Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is an evil day when the people are indifferent to the cost of their government. Such indifference begets prodigality, and the inevitable repentance results in burdens and inconveniences that are irksome to the country.

Thoughtful men have watched with alarm the rapid increase in the cost of government in the United States. This increase is not confined to the Federal Government, but it is apparent in the financial statements of every State and municipality.

The country has been passing through a wonderful period of prosperity. Manufactures have increased astonishingly, our fields have been yielding crops of extraordinary proportions, domestic trade has expanded to unanticipated dimensions, while the products of our farms and factories are displayed in every foreign mart and are utilized in the most remote and inaccessible places of our globe.

As recently pointed out by O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor, since 1870 our foreign commerce has grown from less than $1,000,000,000 to about $4,000,000,000; our internal commerce from $7,000,000,000 to $33,000,000,000. The production of corn has increased from 1,000,000,000 to nearly 3,000,000,000 bushels; of wheat from 235,000,000 to 650,000,000 bushels; of cotton from 3,000,000 bales to 12,000,000 bales; the value of animals on farms from $1,250,000,000 to over $5,000,000,000; the value of farm products from $2,000,000,000 to $8,500,000,000; the gross value of manufactures produced from $4,250,000,000 to $20,000,000,000.

Our people have enjoyed opportunities for the acquisition of knowledge through improved school systems and increased facilities for travel and intercourse with other peoples never before offered in the world's history. They have had unparalleled prosperity and have been furnished with conveniences of modern life which have greatly improved the standard of living and encouraged an indifference to certain governmental matters, which can not always be ignored and must eventually be considered and remedied.

An awakening has been experienced during recent years. The unprecedented increase in the cost of living grossly disproportionate to the increased return for labor, the real measure of values, has resulted in an intelligent inquiry into conditions so unsatisfactory to most of our citizens.

Two causes above all others seem to be conceded as responsible for many of our present evils:

One, the unfair and unjust system of taxation by which an undue share of the income of those whose circumstances in life are not considered more than reasonably comfortable is taken through our customs laws for the support of our Government; the other, the difficulty or inability to readjust our system of taxation, and to remove many taxes from the necessaries of life, so long as the Government is extravagantly conducted, or the instrumentalities provided for the conduct of the public service are either inefficient or are not utilized so as to render the most effective and comprehensive results.

The Democratic Party pledged itself, if intrusted with power, to do two things—to reduce tariff duties and to retrench public expenditures by the elimination of waste in administration and the abolition of useless, unnecessary, and inexcusable offices which hinder rather than advance efficiency in administration.

On August 22, 1911, just a year ago, I said on this floor:

> This House is pledged to reform the administration of public affairs and to retrench public expenditures. No legitimate activity of the Government is to be curtailed, but not a dollar will be appropriated which a careful investigation does not demonstrate should be expended in a wise, efficient, and effective administration of public affairs.

In discharging their duties the Committee on Appropriations have proceeded on the principle thus enunciated. To use the very words of Mr. Garfield, uttered in this House on March 5, 1874:

> They have attempted to ascertain what are the real and vital necessities of the Government; to find what amount of money will suffice to meet all its honorable obligations, to carry on all its necessary and essential functions, to keep alive those public enterprises which the country desires its Government to undertake and accomplish.

It has been generally recognized that imperative reforms in the administration of the Federal Government must be effected. For several years efforts have been made to accomplish many admittedly needed improvements in the public service, which have merely emphasized the necessity for a thorough overhauling of the various services of the Government. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1911 discloses that in the estimates for the fiscal year 1912 a net total of 267 statutory positions in the offices of the Treasury in Washington had been eliminated and that for the present fiscal year—1913—it was proposed to drop 134 positions. That 141 positions had been eliminated in 1910, a total of 542 statutory places abolished since March 4, 1909, and the accompanying saving was accomplished without the separation of anyone from the public service. Deaths and resignations and a system of transfers have made possible the placing of those whose positions were abolished in other places in which vacancies occurred through normal causes.

In the field service during the same period 1,259 positions have been abolished, making a total reduction in the Treasury Department of 1,801.

Striking as these figures seem, demonstrating the contention that the public service has been shamefully overloaded with unnecessary employees, it was confirmed and emphasized by Maj. Gen. Wood, Chief of Staff of the Army. He assured this committee that his statement before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department that the employees in the War Department in Washington were 25 per cent in excess of the number actually required was unquestionably correct. In his opinion the clerical force should be reduced 10 per cent a year until it reached a normal basis.

Conditions as imperatively requiring the attention of Congress undoubtedly exist in practically every executive department of the Government. From none of them, however, has any information, other than as mentioned herein, been furnished as a basis for action.

With the knowledge of the situation the work of improving the public service by improved methods, increased efficiency, and the elimination of unnecessary and useless employees and processes was begun.

This committee appreciated the force of the statement of President Taft in his message of January 17, 1912, that "Real economy is the result of efficient organization. By perfecting the organization the same benefits may be obtained at less expense. A reduction in the total of annual appropriations is not in itself a proof of economy, since it is often accompanied by a decrease in efficiency. The needs of the Nation may demand a large increase of expenditure, yet to keep the total appropriations within the expected revenue is necessary to the maintenance of public credit."

It was in this spirit that the important work of this committee was undertaken. Although the Executive and the Senate are politically hostile to the House, far-reaching reforms in public service have been initiated, while the House has reasserted more vigorously its constitutional prerogatives over the people's purse, and a successful move has been inaugurated to systematize and properly readjust the public service by which it will be immeasurably improved and hereafter conducted at much less expense.

REDUCTIONS MADE.

The estimates of appropriations for support of the Government submitted by the Executive to this session of Congress amount in all to $1,040,648,026.55.

The appropriations made at this session of Congress amount to $1,019,636,143.66.

The latter sum is a reduction of $21,011,882.89 under the estimates and $7,046,738.06 under the appropriations made at the last session of the last Congress, which body was controlled in both branches by the Republican Party.

Excluding the increase of $12,500,000 made under the new law for pensions, the appropriations at this session show a reduction of $19,546,738.06 under the appropriations of the last session of the last Congress and $33,511,882.89 under the estimates approved and submitted by the Executive.

A further analysis of the history of appropriations at this session shows that the committees of the House charged with the preparation of the regular annual supply bills for the fiscal year 1913 reduced them $40,868,434.54 under the estimates recommended to Congress.

The House in passing the bills reduced them $40,135,284.54 under the regular annual estimates and $49,161,361.66 under the appropriations of the previous session.

The Senate committees increased the bills as passed by the House to the extent of $66,223,129.81, or $26,087,845.27 in excess of the total estimates.

The Senate itself in passing the bills further increased them until their aggregate as passed by the House was exceeded by $70,521,715.88 and the estimates by $30,386,431.34.

The increases made by the Senate committees and by the Senate in acting on the bills after they left the House, it is proper to state, included $12,500,000 for payment of pensions under legislation enacted after the House had passed the pension appropriation bill.

The final outcome in the conferences that reconciled the differences between the two Houses, or the increases by the Senate in the 13 regular annual appropriation bills, shows that, exclusive of the increase for pensions, the Senate yielded $30,424,545.38 of the sums they proposed to add, and the House accepted only $27,597,170.50.

The general deficiency act carries a total of only $7,243,474.69, a sum, with one exception, considerably smaller than any similar act passed since 1886. The general deficiency and urgent deficiency acts appropriate a total of $9,701,231.15, a reduction of $9,498,768.85 under the estimates submitted and recommended by the Executive. Deficiency acts have provided in the past not only for deficiencies arising legitimately under the law, but have been made to carry large sums supplemental to the regular appropriations and rendered necessary through reckless and extravagant administration. The elimination of all such appropriations in the bill this session accounts in very large measure for the considerable reduction of $9,498,768.85 in the deficiency estimates submitted and approved by the Executive.

The appropriations made during the session in miscellaneous acts, and additional to the sums carried in the regular annual appropriation acts, deficiency acts, and under permanent annual appropriations, amount approximately to $3,250,000, which sum includes $1,239,179.65 for the relief of sufferers from the floods of the Mississippi River, $650,000 for emergency work in protecting the levees of that river, and $300,000 for lifeboats and life-saving equipment for the transport service of the Army. The whole amount carried in these miscellaneous acts is $1,573,306.81 less than was similarly appropriated at the last session and is more than $20,000,000 less than was thus appropriated at the corresponding or long session of the last Congress.

The largest reduction made in any one of the annual supply bills is that made in the sundry civil bill; it is decreased from $142,265,044.14 to $112,039,184.40, or $30,225,859.74 less than was appropriated by the act for last year.

The fortification act shows a greater proportionate decrease than any of the other service acts. It is reduced $1,437,742 from a previous total of $5,473,707, or more than 26 per cent.

The pension act is increased more than any other, namely, from $153,682,000 to $165,146,145.84. This considerable increase grows out of the act passed at this session materially increasing the rates of pension to those who served in the Civil War and in the War with Mexico.

USELESS PENSION AGENCIES ABOLISHED.

In connection with the pension act a notable accomplishment was wrought in the abolition of the 18 pension agencies for the payment of pensions with salaries of $4,000 each. During Mr. Cleveland's last administration he sought, by Executive order under the authority still existing, to rid the Treasury of the burden of some of these useless and costly places by consolidating and reducing them from 18 to 9, but his Republican successor in office suspended the order before it could be placed in operation. Since that time many efforts have been made to abolish them outright, but without success, until the persistence of the House at this session was crowned with success. The annual saving that will follow the doing away with these sinecures, the consolidation of their 18 different clerical forces into one effective organization under the direction of the Pension Bureau in Washington, the elimination of rents and other needless expenses will speedily result in a saving of at least $250,000 a year.

PENSION PAYMENTS EXPEDITED.

In addition an entirely new and modern system for the payment of pensions has been provided which will result in considerable saving to the pensioners and make more convenient the payment of the pension moneys.

Heretofore under the agency and voucher system within 15 days after the date the pension is due the pension agent prepared a voucher for every pensioner paid from the respective agencies. These vouchers were mailed to the pensioners. They had to be executed before notaries public and returned to the pension agent. Upon their receipt within a designated time the pension agent sent his check to the pensioner for the amount due. Much of the work done in the various agencies scattered throughout the country was necessarily duplicated in Washington.

PENSIONERS SAVED EXPENSE.

In connection with the abolition of the 18 agencies legislation was enacted to pay all pensions from Washington by means of the check voucher system. Hereafter on the date the pension is due the check for the amount of the pension, with a voucher attached, will be mailed to the pensioner. All that need be done to cash the check will be for the pensioner to indorse the check, which is also the receipt, and by having two of his neighbors sign as witnesses the check passes as any bankable paper. The necessity to have the services of a notary public is eliminated. When it is recalled that there are 892,078 persons drawing pensions, a very large number of whom are required to pay at least $1 a year for notary fees, besides the inconvenience that results from seeking notaries when needed, the advantage in money and comfort to the pensioner, in addition to the efficiency and economy in the administration of the Pension Service, can readily be calculated.

The post-office and river and harbor acts are also increased—the first from $259,134,463 to $271,429,599, or $12,295,136, and the river and harbor act from $23,855,342 to $31,059,370.50, or $7,204,028.50.

The naval act is decreased from $126,478,338.24 to $123,220,707.48, a reduction of $3,257,630.76, while the Army act shows a still greater reduction of $4,241,352.81, being cut from $93,374,755.97 to $89,133,403.16. This latter saving is not for one year only, but under the wise and radical administrative provisions in the act, initiated in the House and pressed to final enactment by the Committee on Military Affairs, the saving will be annual and will undoubtedly prove even larger during each of the next few years. The intervention of a presidential veto defeated other and equally meritorious legislation on this bill.

The act providing for the government of the District of Columbia shows a material reduction from $12,056,786.50 to $10,675,833.50, or $1,380,953, a sum that will go far toward reimbursing the Treasury of the United States the balance due for large sums advanced to make up deficiencies in the District of Columbia revenues, occasioned by lavish and extravagant appropriations of the past few years.

The amount submitted by the Treasury as required under permanent appropriations and carried in the comparative statement of appropriations by this Congress is $133,058,924.12, as against $129,575,924.12 for 1912, an increase of $3,483,000, for which of course the present Congress is in no way accountable. The chief items of increase indicated under permanent appropriations and which almost wholly account for the entire increase are the sums of $1,175,000 for interest on the public debt increased by the issue of Panama Canal bonds and $2,000,000, the second annual sum required under the Appalachian Park law for which a sum is now for the first time stated under permanent appropriations.

The legislative, executive, and judicial act, carrying $34,229,613.38 and providing for the great salary roll of the departmental service at Washington, is reduced from $35,378,149.85, or a saving of $1,148,536.47, and several hundred places are permanently dropped from the Government's pay rolls. This act as it passed the House and was subsequently vetoed because it abolished a useless and discredited court, made a reduction of $2,374,355.79 under the total of like appropriations of the previous year, and also dropped 406 needless employees.

USELESS PUBLIC EMPLOYMENTS.

With an efficient, well-organized working force in the departments at Washington, the whole number of salaried places now provided for could and should be reduced many hundred more. This is very evident, as I have heretofore pointed out in references to the Treasury and War Departments. A provision in this act requires a further reduction in the Treasury Department of 164 statutory offices during this fiscal year in addition to other reductions, which will be discussed later.

ECONOMY IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Substantially no new places are provided for by this act in any department; on the other hand, in addition to the reduction in the Treasury, 75 places are abolished, with salaries amounting to nearly $100,000, in the service of the House of Representatives under its present Democratic organization, and in the War Department it is provided that no vacancies shall be filled until the whole force shall have been reduced by 5 per cent.

NEW BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

Another reform feature effected in this act that will conduce to economy and to greatly increased efficiency by preventing duplication of work in a service vitally effecting the industrial and commercial interests of the country is the consolidation in the Department of Commerce and Labor of the old Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics under a new and well-equipped bureau, with largely increased and well-defined powers and functions, to be known as the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

This bureau is destined to be one of the most important in the entire Government. Its creation will eventually be recognized as most gratifying constructive legislation. Many good meaning but thoughtless men have been enamored of a tariff board. They have been clamoring that the "tariff be taken out of politics"—as if such a thing were possible. What every sincere man desired was the establishment of some service through which might be obtained accurate information in systematized form relative to the infinite variety of matters affected by tariff legislation, without having such information filter through some intervening body to be colored, or modified, or affected by such a course. In the bureau now established there will be developed a force of statistical experts, apart from the political atmosphere, who will compile the facts upon which legislation may be intelligently based in accordance with the economic theory of the party in control of the Government.

CENTRAL DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Still another measure of economy and increased efficiency provided for is one embraced in section 8, requiring that all of the work incident to the distribution of Government publications shall be made direct from the Government Printing Office. This change has been in contemplation and under discussion for quite a generation, having been suggested for the first time in 1882. The advisability has long been conceded, but for various reasons the reform was not effected. It was stoutly resisted at this session by many officials who disliked to surrender any of the control which they now exercise of this work. As finally worked out it is estimated a saving in expenses of not less than $250,000 a year will result and the change will contribute in no small degree to increased efficiency and expedition in service.

Hereafter under this legislation there will be a central distributing plant in Washington from which departmental documents shall be shipped. Instead of handling documents several or many times, with large forces scattered through the various departments for such work, it shall all be done from a single office where the volume of business to be handled will make possible the organization and the development of a highly efficient force, and will justify the introduction of many labor and money saving devices which can not be used under the present methods.

CUSTOMS SERVICE TO BE REORGANIZED.

The sundry civil appropriation act, in addition to the large specific reduction of more than $30,000,000, which it shows under the last law, provides for the most comprehensive and important administrative reform proposed since the Civil War. It will result in an annual saving by a reduction of expenditures of at least $700,000 per annum, and will insure an increased return from the more efficient administration of the customs service estimated at as high as $20,000,000 yearly.

The present organization of the customs service is archaic. It dates practically from the beginning of the Government. The service has never been reorganized. As the country developed and expanded new ports and subports of entry have been established. Once established, no matter what the changed conditions, a port is never abolished. The expenses of maintenance is continued regardless of the necessity of the office. A former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, noted for his capacity for organization, expressed the belief that with a proper organization probably 25 per cent of the present cost of the service could be saved. To illustrate the situation, in 1909 it cost twenty-two one-hundredths of a cent to collect a dollar of revenue at the port of New York, where 66 per cent of the customs are paid; at Annapolis, Md., it cost $309.41; in Alexandria, Va., it cost $122.49; in Natchez, Miss., it cost $52.76. In 38 ports it cost more than a dollar to collect a dollar.

At present Congress has practically no control over the expenditures for the collection of customs. Under the act of 1871, section 3687 of the Revised Statutes, $2,750,000 is appropriated every six months to defray the expense of collecting the customs. This sum is so inadequate, however, that Congress has been appropriating $5,000,000 additional for several years. For the last fiscal year it cost $10,850,000.

For many years Congress has been urged to repeal the permanent appropriation of $5,500,000 annually, to make specific annual appropriations, as it does for almost every other service of the Government, and to reorganize the service by rearranging the districts, readjusting compensations, abolishing useless offices, and adopting modern and up-to-date methods in order that the very best results might be obtained with the least expenditure of money.

In the sundry civil act this has been done. Plenary power has been given to the President to reorganize the service so as to place it upon the most efficient basis possible. After careful investigation it was determined that such results could be accomplished with an expenditure of $700,000 less than for last year, and a limitation has been placed upon the authority granted, requiring that the reorganized service shall not require an expenditure of more than $10,150,000 annually.

This saving is not deducted from the appropriations made at this session for the current fiscal year. It will be gained in the next bill, while the Treasury will be further enriched by the increased efficiency in the administration of the customs law. As a part of this reform, the law making the permanent appropriations has been repealed and the submission of detailed estimates for the consideration hereafter by Congress required.

This same power over the internal-revenue districts and service was given to the President in section 3141 of the Revised Statutes. As a result the number of districts was cut in two. The internal revenues are collected, with better-paid officials in charge, for 2.02 per cent of the collections, while the customs duties, with poorer-paid officials in charge, costs 3.03 per cent of the collections, or 50 per cent more than the other service.

Other and equally meritorious, if less conspicuous, measures of reformatory legislation are carried in the general appropriation acts passed this session, namely:

In the legislative act, after surviving two presidential vetoes, the following:

CONGRESS TO CONTROL ESTIMATES FOR EXPENDITURES.

A final section prohibiting the preparation and submission of the annual estimates of appropriations except in the form, and at the time, prescribed by law. This provision was enacted on the well-grounded assumption that Congress knew best the character and extent of the information it desired in responding to the demands of the Executive for appropriations, and because it had enacted a score of well-considered statutes on the subject. It was believed, also, that it would not be wise for Congress to abdicate, even by implication, its prerogative in this matter. A message from the President had already laid before Congress a very full and luminous exposition of the proposed "national budget," and until it could be determined by careful and deliberate study of the scheme whether it should be accepted and adopted, it was not deemed wise or provident to have, as indicated in the public press, the time and energies of large numbers of the most capable persons in the several branches of the public service diverted to transforming the entire estimates for the next fiscal year into this new and unauthorized plan of a so-called national budget, to the neglect of their ordinary and pressing duties. Another consideration of no small moment was the fact that to print the estimates in the proposed new form would cost many thousands of dollars. The printing of the President's message submitting a mere sample of the new proposition alone cost nearly $4,000.

It was apparent, moreover, that those in the confidence of the President were not either familiar nor in sympathy with the congressional requirements and viewpoint. This is clear from the statement of the President in his message of June 27, 1912, that "the present law governing the preparation and submission of estimates, requiring them to be submitted each year in the same form as the year before, was passed without due consideration as to what information should be laid before Congress as a basis for action, the result being that the unsystematic and confused method before in use was made continuous."

On the contrary the act to which the President refers (June 22, 1906, Stat. L., vol. 34, p. 448) was passed after the most careful consideration. I have personal knowledge of the conditions which made its enactment imperative and I participated in its preparation. The reason for its enactment was to stop a vicious practice which had grown up in the departments of switching estimates in such a manner as to get consideration by committees deemed friendly to the project or service. If permitted to continue it would have placed the work of Congress in chaos and have resulted in a riot of extravagant appropriations that would have staggered an already overburdened Treasury.

DUPLICATION OF WORK PROHIBITED.

Another provision is one regulating the administrative audit of all accounts, under the so-called Dockery law of 1894, so as to break up the rapidly increasing duplication of work in the many disbursing offices. Under a system grown up in those offices, and naturally fostered by the ambitious chiefs thereof, it was disclosed that in one department the disbursing clerk had obtained an organization of upward of 100 clerks and employees with salaries of more than $100,000 a year, while in another department, expending no less a sum of public money each year, the total force employed did not exceed 10 and their total annual pay was less than $20,000, and this very office ranks as probably the most efficient of its class in Washington.

In another provision in the body of the act the number of internal-revenue collectors, having maximum salaries of $4,500 each, is reduced from 67 to 63, after October 1, 1912. The reduction was made because it was demonstrated that there were more than were necessary. The President could have abolished these offices, as he could have abolished the 18 pension agencies. He did not do so. Many messages were received by him upon the question of economy. Action was needed, not talk. "Where, where was Roderick then? One blast upon his bugle horn were worth a thousand men." One order of the President abolishing these useless offices would have had a more beneficial effect upon the public service than all the messages written by Presidents from the beginning of the Government.

INEFFICIENT EMPLOYEES TO BE DISMISSED AND OTHER ECONOMIES ENFORCED.

Section 3 of the act prohibits payment of salaries to persons in the public service incapacitated otherwise than temporarily for performing service, and forbids the payment of compensation out of lump appropriations to persons formerly receiving specific salaries in excess of the rate of such specific salaries. The latter provision is designed to break up an evil practice that has gradually been evolved under which the Government is made to compete against itself, by one department holding out to employees of another department the inducement of pay, out of some lump appropriation, in excess of that he may be receiving under some specific provision of law or appropriation.

Section 4 requires the establishment of three efficiency ratings in the classified service of the departments at Washington, failure to attain which in the first grade prevents promotion, in the second grade requires demotion, and in the third grade provides dismissal; and a severe penalty is provided for all who knowingly violate this law. A fair and honest execution of this law will speedily rid the departmental service of all incompetent persons, the presence of whom is now so frequently the subject of complaint.

Section 5 prescribes a penalty for violation of the act of 1882 prohibiting the employment of persons in the departments at Washington unless specific authority be granted for such employment. This law has been constantly violated and almost continuously so of late years. The hazard of imprisonment it is believed will effectively stop the practice and incidentally save no inconsiderable sum of money each year.

Section 6 prohibits the maintenance at public expense of telephones in private residences or private apartments. The need for such a law was urgently invited by the development of the fact that one high official of the Government at Washington indulged in the extravagance, out of the public purse, of two telephones in his private residence.

On the sundry civil act:

A provision repealing the so-called Tarsney Act, authorizing the employment of outside architects in the construction of public buildings. Experience under this law begot the well-founded criticism that construction was delayed, extravagance encouraged, and the American Institute of Architects required of its members that they charge the United States for services 1 per cent more on the total cost of buildings than was required of individuals.

The Government maintains a well-organized architect's office costing upward of $1,000,000 a year. In the judgment of three of the committees of the House there was no sound reason for the employment of outside talent under the conditions imposed by the architects by which they charged the United States 20 per centum more than they received from other clients. While the service of the best architectural talent at times is required by the Government, it should and, as experience has shown, can be had upon reasonable terms fair to the Government as well as attractive to the architects.

Another provision stops, until otherwise provided by law, any additional appointments of cadets or cadet engineers in the Revenue-Cutter Service. It costs about $2,700 per annum to maintain and educate each of the 27 cadets now in the school during the three-year period of their education. As there will be no need for additional officers for several years, this source of needless expense is stopped.

Another provision prohibits the filling of vacancies occurring by death or resignation in the membership of the several commissions in charge of national military parks. There are now 12 of these commissioners and they are paid each $3,600 per annum. As vacancies occur the duties will gradually be devolved upon the War Department. The administration will be efficient, the expense very much less than at present.

Under the Bureau of Engraving and Printing a permanent provision of law is enacted authorizing the extension of the use of power presses in the work of the bureau. It is estimated that this increased use of power presses will result in an immediate annual saving of $140,000, and within five years a total saving per annum of not less than $600,000. The gain made by this provision has not been taken from the current appropriations, but will be apparent in the next act.

Section 4 prohibits future payments for maintenance of Toro Point Light on the Isthmus of Panama. Such payments have amounted to about $40,000 per annum in the past. The light serves no useful purpose to our maritime interests. The proprietors of the light hold some sort of questionable or obsolete concession from the Republic of Colombia under which they levy tribute on commerce.

Section 5 provides for a division of records for the Panama Canal in order to preserve permanently the engineering records and history of the canal construction. The assembling and arrangement of these records at this time is a matter of the greatest importance and is indispensable to the future efficient operation and economical maintenance of the canal.

Section 6 requires the submission, following all lump-sum estimates for appropriations exceeding $250,000, of comparative statements disclosing the purposes for which previous like sums were expended and details of how the expenditures are intended to be made under the estimates. This will give not only to the committees charged with preparing appropriation bills but to the membership of the House and the entire public a graphic showing of expenditures made and those in contemplation.

Section 7 provides that no appropriation hereafter made by Congress shall be held to be continuing and expendable beyond the year for which it is made, unless it shall be so declared in explicit terms. By construction of accounting officers many appropriations have in the past been defined as permanent and continuing when they were never so intended by Congress in making them. Permanent appropriations, even those designedly made, are not conducive to economy or efficiency in administration and, what is more important, to a reasonable knowledge on the part of Congress of how the public money is being expended each year.

Section 8 requires certain officers and employees of the United States to administer without additional pay oaths to expense accounts of public officials. This will retrench expenses about $60,000 per annum.

On the District of Columbia act:

Section 9 prohibits any expenditures for fees or dues of any officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia for membership in any society or association or for expenses of attendance at any meeting of members of any society or association unless express provision is made for such expenditures. Except as to payment of fees or dues the provisions of this section are not to be operative during the current fiscal year. This is to permit the consideration of estimates at the next session so that provision may be made thereunder for specific cases where Congress may determine it proper and necessary to provide for expenses of attendance at meetings of the character in question.

Section 9 makes the provisions of the antideficiency law applicable to expenditures for the government of the District of Columbia. This law, as applied to the expenses of the General Government, has literally resulted in the saving of millions of dollars.

NO NEW AVENUES TO THE TREASURY.

It will be observed that the purpose of each and every one of these "substantive" provisions of law have for their chief objects economy in expenditures and the promotion of efficiency in the public service, and that none are designed to establish new or to enlarge and foster old avenues to the Treasury.

They are all provisions highly beneficial to the public service. Their enactment will save to the Treasury many millions annually, and very greatly improve the administration of the public service. They are all "legislation on appropriation bills," so much condemned by thoughtless, ignorant, or designing persons during this session of Congress.

As a result of their enactment, however, the Democratic House has been able to work many reforms in the public service, despite a hostile Senate and Executive, from whom it received no material aid and very slight encouragement.

A change in the method of printing the legislative, executive, and judicial, sundry civil, and general deficiency appropriation bills was instituted by the Committee on Appropriations at this session by expressing all sums of money in them in figures instead of spelling them out at length as heretofore. The change seems to have met with universal commendation. An estimate by the Public Printer shows that the new method has resulted in a saving of not less than $5,563.60 and a diminution of 134 pages in all of the four or more editions of the three bills and 67 pages of the volume of the Statutes at Large when it is published.

If this method is applied to the other 11 regular appropriation bills a total saving will result of not less than $10,000 per annum and, what is even quite as desirable, the volume of the annual statutes will be reduced by quite 150 pages.

THE LAW OF ESTIMATES EVADED.

Under the act of March 4, 1909, the Secretary of the Treasury is required immediately after the receipt of the regular annual estimates of appropriations for the various branches of the public service to estimate as nearly as may be the revenues of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year; and if the estimates for appropriations, including the estimated amount necessary to meet all continuing and permanent appropriations, shall exceed the estimated revenues, he is commanded to transmit the estimates to Congress, as previously required by law, and after that to transmit a detailed statement of all of said estimates to the President, to the end that he may, in giving Congress information of the state of the Union, advise how in his judgment the estimated appropriations could with least injury to the public service be reduced so as to bring the appropriations within the estimated revenues, or, if such reduction be not in his judgment practicable without undue injury to the public service, that he may recommend to Congress such loans or new taxes as may be necessary to cover the deficiency.

The President has never complied with this law in letter or in spirit. The Secretary of the Treasury, who is an officer of Congress and subject to its will, in a measure that does not apply to the head of any other executive department, has ignored it in a manner that deserves the severest criticism.

In order to make a showing of pretended economy on the part of the administration, an order has gone forth, written or verbal, that no estimate shall be transmitted to Congress, by its own officer, the Secretary of the Treasury, and notwithstanding the law to the contrary, until the same has been authorized by the President. Under this unlawful proceeding Congress has been denied the real estimates prepared by the departments; in some cases items have been wholly suppressed, in others estimates based upon ascertained legal requirements have been wantonly reduced, for the purpose of arbitrarily bringing the total of estimates within a certain amount. As proof of this assertion I quote from Secretary of the Navy Meyer's letter transmitting, after the regular annual estimates had been sent to this Congress, an estimate of $1,000,000 for the Naval Service:

> This item was not included in the original estimates submitted to you for transmission to Congress, as the department was desirous of keeping the total of estimates to as low a figure as possible.

Brig. Gen. Henry G. Sharpe, Commissary General of the Army, in appearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations charged with the preparation of the general deficiency bill; made the following statements with reference to the estimates of appropriations for subsistence of the United States Army:

> The CHAIRMAN. When you submitted your estimates for the current fiscal year for subsistence, did you give the number of rations on which you figured?
> Gen. SHARPE. The number of rations is stated there.
> The CHAIRMAN. And you estimated them at 21.87 cents each?
> Gen. SHARPE. When we first submitted it, we figured the ration at 23 cents each; but we were directed to reduce the estimate by $534,000, and the only way to reduce was to reduce the price of the rations.
> The CHAIRMAN. Why were you directed to reduce the estimate?
> Gen. SHARPE. Those were the instructions of the Secretary of War. We were told to cut it down $534,000.
> The CHAIRMAN. I remember the statement was made that the amount appropriated would be inadequate.
> Gen. SHARPE. I made that statement, and it was inadequate. We will not have enough for next year, and I am coming up before you again next year, Mr. Chairman, for the same reason.

Brig. Gen. George R. Smith, Paymaster General of the Army, in appearing before the same subcommittee in support of estimates for a deficiency in the appropriations for the pay of officers and enlisted men of the Army, testified as follows:

> The CHAIRMAN. You have a deficiency of $1,800,000?
> Gen. SMITH. Yes, sir.
> The CHAIRMAN. Your estimate was $44,959,442.95?
> Gen. SMITH. Yes, sir.
> The CHAIRMAN. And the appropriation was $44,625,042.95. What was your original estimate as transmitted to the Secretary?
> Gen. SMITH. The original estimate was cut in the office of the Secretary of War $1,550,000.
> The CHAIRMAN. Do you know why that was?
> Gen. SMITH. No, sir.
> The CHAIRMAN. What was your estimate based on?
> Gen. SMITH. It was based on the strength of the Army.
> The CHAIRMAN. And then Congress appropriated about $334,400 less than the estimate submitted by the Secretary?
> Gen. SMITH. Yes, sir.
> The CHAIRMAN. And that makes practically the $1,800,000 that you now need?
> Gen. SMITH. Yes, sir.
> * * * * * * * *
> Mr. BARTLETT. If the estimates from your office had been transmitted to Congress and that amount provided there would have been no deficiency?
> Gen. SMITH. No, sir; I think we would have gotten through pretty nicely.

The Secretary of the Treasury, well aware of the established policy of Congress to make each year specific appropriations for construction of public buildings, submitted at the beginning of this session a lump sum of $3,000,000 coupled with the suggestion that he be clothed with the discretion to apply that sum, and all unexpended balances of previous specific appropriations for buildings, to such of the hundreds of authorized structures as he might designate. By this unwarranted and unusual method of submitting estimates a further apparent, but fictitious, reduction of $10,234,201.20 was made in the sum total of the estimates submitted at the beginning of the session, and to that extent he further contributed to the deception of the public as to the real amount of estimated expenditures proposed by the Executive.

Notwithstanding all of this avoidance of the plain intent of the law by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, the former has, in another and more serious particular, failed to comply with a further important requirement of this enactment, namely, that he should in the event the estimated appropriations exceeded the estimated revenues—> advise the Congress how in his judgment the estimated appropriations could with least injury to the public be reduced so as to bring the appropriations within the estimated revenues or, if such reduction be not in his judgment practicable without undue injury to the public service, that he may recommend to Congress such loans or new taxes as may be necessary to cover the deficiency.

The annual estimates submitted to Congress as required by law in December last, even after shamefully juggling them as I have shown, amounted to $1,006,773,026.55; at the same time the total estimated revenues from all sources amounted to only $927,938,463, a discrepancy of $78,834,563.55, which, it was designed by the law, the President should aid the Congress with advice and counsel how to overcome by cutting down, or by laying new taxes, or borrowing money. Instead it remained for this House, controlled by the Democratic Party, by its own unaided efforts to solve in a large measure the problem by cutting the President's estimates $40,135,284.54 in the annual bills as they were sent to a Republican Senate. Not only did the President fail in his lawful duty to aid this House in the weary task he set before them of reducing his excessive and extravagant estimates, but he added to the perplexity of the situation by thrusting upon them from time to time, with his written approval, supplemental estimates amounting to $16,675,000 and deficiency estimates for $19,200,000 more.

The action of the Executive in making arbitrary reductions in estimates of appropriations whose necessary amounts are so patently capable of actual computation before they are submitted to Congress is grossly misleading to the Congress and to the people of the country, and demonstrates most conclusively that it was made, not with a view of effecting economy in expenditures, but with the bold intention of misrepresenting to the Nation the amounts of its money which would be required for the support of the Government. The revelation of these facts will, I am sure, raise a doubt in the minds of the public at large as to the sincerity of the administration in its protestations of retrenchment.

It makes idle all discussion of a so-called "National Budget" when such practices are adopted, and the failure to obey the existing laws relative to the submission of estimates more than all else contributes to the difficulties of those charged with the responsibilities of preparing the supply bills.

GROWTH OF APPROPRIATIONS CHECKED.

It should be observed that the appropriations made at this session are materially less than the appropriations made at either of the last three regular sessions, namely:

Less than those of the last session in providing for the fiscal year 1912 by $7,046,738.06.

Less than those of the previous session in providing for the fiscal year 1911 by $8,265,285.52.

Less than those of the session which provided for the fiscal year 1910 by $8,870,427.28.

To have checked the abnormal and rapid growth of appropriations is in itself no mean achievement for this House, and to have made the indicated reductions with the encouragement that the lavish appropriations Republican Congresses had given to those seeking aid from the Federal Treasury was a task almost impossible of accomplishment.

In addition to the considerable excess of direct appropriations made at the last session of the last Congress over those of this session, contract obligations were also authorized at that time, for further expenditures, in the sum of $43,454,145 as against $22,711,400, authorized at this session for similar contract liabilities, thus constituting another comparison favorable to this Congress as against its immediate Republican predecessor to the extent of $20,742,745, which, added to the reduction we have made in specific appropriations, makes a combined reduction under appropriations and liabilities of the last session of $27,789,483.06.

These contract authorizations are frequently made to satisfy the desires of those seeking legislation, but who are content to obtain the authority even if the appropriation be deferred. The result, however, is to burden succeeding Congresses with the obligation to appropriate to carry out these authorizations and frequently to cause criticism for results which were inevitable under laws previously enacted.

PLEDGES KEPT.

This review demonstrates that the pledges of the Democratic Party have been kept. Substantial reductions in expenditures have been made, and comprehensive reforms that will bring about substantial reductions hereafter and greatly improve the efficiency of the public service have been effected and many activities of the Government extended, while new services have been initiated, without denying to any service a single dollar required for its legitimate needs.

NAVAL EFFICIENCY MAINTAINED.

An attempt has been made to mislead the public into the belief that the economies effected have been at the expense of the Naval Establishment. Knowledge of the facts makes the attempt ridiculous. During this session more has been done to put the fleet upon an effective fighting basis than in any session of Congress in my service.

Congress provided 1 first-class battleship, 2 fuel ships, 6 torpedo-boat destroyers, 8 submarine torpedo boats, 1 tender to destroyers, 1 submarine tender, 4,000 additional enlisted men, 400 marines, 13 marine officers, 30 paymasters, authority to modernize the guns, projectiles, and other facilities of existing battleships so as to make them more effective. Provision was made to enlarge the dry dock in Hawaii, to establish a world-wide wireless system, to establish coal depots for the fleet, to organize a Dental Corps and a Medical Corps.

All of these matters are of the utmost importance if the ships and men already provided are to be effective as a fighting force.

During this session I have had the hearty cooperation of all of the members of this committee, for which I am very grateful. The best indication of the effectiveness of their work is the fact that, with the exception of the pension appropriation act, which carries more money than the act of last year because of the legislation granting liberal increases of pensions to Civil and Mexican War veterans, every other appropriation bill over which the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction when enacted into law carried, in a marked degree, less money than the preceding act.

What has been done this session is merely an illustration of what may be accomplished if the Democratic Party is given that opportunity which only comes with full control of the Government. What has been accomplished resulted from persistent efforts and unmeasured determination.

We ask an intelligent and impartial judgment upon accomplished results; we believe it justifies the continuance and the enlargement of our power in the Government.

The following table gives in the customary form a complete history of the appropriation bills for this session of Congress, beginning with the estimates submitted by the Executive and following the course of each bill through to its final approval:

[1] The Army and the legislative bills for 1913 as originally passed were vetoed by the President June 17 and Aug. 15 and 21, 1912, respectively. In order to preserve their history, the several dates of their consideration are noted, and amounts carried are indicated in parentheses, but the amounts (in parentheses) of the vetoed bills are not included in any of the totals stated herein.

[2] This amount includes $1,350,000 appropriated in a joint resolution, approved July 8, 1912, for the Organized Militia, a like sum having been carried by the Army act which was vetoed, and omitted from the Army act finally approved.

[3] One-half of the amounts for the District of Columbia payable by the United States, except amounts for the water department (estimated for 1913 at $135,785), which are payable from the revenues of the water department.

[4] Includes all expenses of the postal service payable from postal revenues and out of the Treasury.

[5] In addition to this amount the sum of $12,114,988 to meet contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvment is included in the sundry civil estimates for 1913.

[6] In addition to this amount the sum of $9,500,250 to meet contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements is included in the sundry civil act for 1913.

[7] In addition to this amount the sum of $7,028,077 was appropriated in the sundry civil act to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements for 1912.

[8] This amount includes $12,114,988 to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements, and $47,263,760.20 for construction and fortification of the Isthmian Canal for 1913.

[9] This amount includes $9,500,250 to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements, and $31,786,950 for construction of the Isthmian Canal for 1912.

[10] This amount includes $7,028,077 to carry out contracts authorized by law for river and harbor improvements, and $48,560,000 for the construction and fortification of the Isthmian Canal for 1912.

[11] This amount is approximated.

[12] This is the amount submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury in the annual estimates for the fiscal year 1913, the exact amount appropriated not being ascertainable until two years after the close of the fiscal year. This amount includes estimated amount of $60,650,000 to meet sinking-fund obligations for 1913.

[13] In addition to this amount contracts are authorized to be entered into, subject to future appropriations by Congress, as follows: By the fortification act, $371,400; by the naval act, $20,140,000; by the river and harbor act, $2,200,000; in all, $22,711,400.

[14] In addition to this amount contracts are authorized to be entered into, subject to future appropriations by Congress, as follows: By the naval act, $30,352,500; and by the river and harbor act, $13,101,645; in all, $43,454,145.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, appropriation bills have their origination in the House of Representatives. The Republican House at its last session in 1911 originated the appropriations for the public service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1911, and ending June 30, 1912. The Democratic House at this session of Congress originated appropriations for the year beginning July 1, 1912, and ending June 30, 1913. It is proper at this time to make a comparison between the appropriations for the two fiscal years.

Many have been the promises of economy, and much has been said on the floor of this House and elsewhere about the accomplishments of the Democratic Party with respect to its ability to reduce the annual running expenses of the Government.

In its Baltimore platform that party denounces what it terms the "profligate waste" of the people's money through "lavish appropriations" of Republican Congresses, and declares for a return to Democratic simplicity and the abolishment of useless offices.

APPROPRIATIONS EXCEED THOSE OF LAST YEAR.

The total amount, including permanent appropriations, granted at the last session of the last Congress when the Republican House had charge of appropriation bills, was $1,026,682,881.72.

The stated total amount, including permanents appropriated at this session by origination in a Democratic House, is $1,019,636,143.66.

In consideration of these two great totals it is proper to state that all money expended for the construction of the Panama Canal is reimbursable to the Treasury of the United States through the sale of bonds already authorized for that purpose, and since these sums are not a burden upon the revenues of the country they should, for purposes of comparison, be eliminated from the total amounts appropriated. A Republican House at the last session of Congress provided for this great canal the sum of $45,560,000, and through the requirements of the law making these appropriations continue available until they are finally expended, there remained in the Treasury at the end of the last year amounts of money exceeding $5,000,000 for canal construction, which made it possible for the Democratic House to reduce, as they have, the sums for the canal for next year to $28,980,000.

Therefore, deducting the $45,560,000 for canal construction from the total appropriations last year of $1,026,682,881.72, there remains an aggregate of $981,122,881.72, and deducting the $28,980,000 for canal construction from the total amounts made at this session there remains an aggregate of $990,656,143.66, a sum which exceeds the grand total of all appropriations made by the Republican House at the last session of last Congress by $9,533,261.94.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman thinks that those things that do not come out of the ordinary receipts of the Government should be eliminated?

Mr. CANNON. I think the Panama Canal should be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, why not the Post Office expenditures? They are paid for out of the postal receipts. That would make a difference of $11,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, there is a permanent appropriation appropriating the post-office receipts. It is a part of the permanent appropriations, and has been for a quarter of a century.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just one other thing: The gentleman, although he eliminates appropriations, incorporates over $1,000,000 additional of permanent appropriations, as the result of the sale of Panama bonds last year.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; and $2,000,000 of permanent appropriations for the Appalachian Park.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken. I eliminate the Panama proposition; and all other appropriations are either appropriations for the ordinary expenses or permanent appropriations authorized by law.

Now, having stated that much, lo and behold, what happened? I will print this statement in full, and I am merely explaining two or three things, hitting a dry place here and hitting a dry place there. Six million dollars is the amount of the deficiency bill to make up the deficiencies where the appropriations fell short—the appropriations that were made by the last Republican Congress. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] states—and tells us the truth—that that is the smallest deficiency that has been passed since 1886. That is true. That shows how efficiently the work was done by the last session of the last Republican Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Then there is another thing. The gentleman, although he may be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—and I hope he will be, and he deserves to be, so long as you have the Democratic House [applause] for his intelligence, his industry, and his honesty and fidelity—although he might preside over that committee for years to come, he never would report as small a deficiency bill as he has reported this year. [Applause on the Republican side.] He has reported a deficiency bill this year that cares for all matters of deficiency of the past year.

Why, gentlemen, the regular estimate for pensions, made before the late pension legislation was enacted, was $153,000,000. That was given; but since that time new pension legislation has been enacted, and, in round numbers, 500,000 claims are now pending and are being rapidly, and will be more rapidly, disposed of, as the weeks come and go. Now, they increased the appropriation on that account from $153,000,000 to $165,000,000. There is enough money appropriated to pay pensions until after the election, and more than enough [laughter on the Republican side]; but the gentleman will report a bill carrying at least $20,0000,000 in addition to pay pensions for the present fiscal year.

There are various other matters of deficiency. I expect, if the Lord spares me, to be present at the last session of this Congress, to see the gentleman report a bill or bills before the 4th day of next March appropriating $30,000,000 for deficencies that ought to be carried by this bill. How? Why, the country grows. Thank God, it grows. We legislate for increasing appropriations. Thank God, we do so legislate. I never want to see the time when appropriations will drop back. I want to see them increase, to meet the necessities of a growing and an advancing civilization. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, my statement is in manuscript, and I resume the reading of the same at the point where I was interrupted by my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

DEFICIENCIES IN PENSIONS AND OTHER APPROPRIATIONS WILL RESULT.

In presenting to the House the general deficiency bill, providing deficiencies for the fiscal year 1912, for which fiscal year appropriations had been made by a Republican Congress and approved by a Republican President, the chairman of the Committee on Apropriations stated that it was the smallest deficiency bill that had been presented to the House since 1886. The minority of this House is grateful to the chairman of that committee for the merited compliment that he has paid to the preceding Republican administration of the House. The fact that the general deficiency bill is the smallest in a quarter of a century is an evidence of the thoroughness with which the appropriation bills were prepared and considered by a Republican House and a tribute to the manner in which the public service has been handled and the money expended. One thing, more than any other, that has made possible this remarkable statement on the part of the chairman of the committee is the antideficiency law, initiated in 1906 by the then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Hon. James A. Tawney, and passed by a Republican House, and which for the first time in the history of our Government successfully raised a barrier against the expenditure of any money not authorized by law. It is well that he makes this statement at this time, for he is in the only position to make it he will ever be in.

It is fortunate indeed for him that his first general deficiency bill follows acts which judiciously provided for all branches of the public service, for when the appropriations made at this session have been allotted to the governmental departments and establishments they will fall so far short that in presenting to the next session of this Congress the bills providing for deficiencies he will be able to make the further remarkable statement that the deficiency bill is the largest ever brought into the House since 1886. I make this statement advisedly and call the attention of the House to the estimate of $152,687,750 for the payment of pensions, made prior to the enactment of the recent pension law. The appropriation made for the payment of pensions for this year is $165,146,145.84. Already under the legislation increasing pensions there have been filed, in round numbers, one-half million claims, which, it is hoped, will be rapidly adjudicated, and I have no doubt that it will increase the appropriation for pensions over and above the amount appropriated for this year by at least requiring a deficiency appropriation for pensions of $20,000,000.

The policy of the Democratic House has been to decrease the appropriations as largely as possible prior to the election in November next, and for the purpose of claiming Democratic economy; but the legislation of this Congress, coupled with the growth of the country and the legitimate demands of the public service, will compel the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, when Congress meets in December next to report deficiency bills during that session to cover appropriations which should have been made at this session for at least $30,000,000 for the public service during this fiscal year, and which have been withheld for the purpose of establishing a fallacious claim of Democratic economy.

INSUFFICIENT FUNDS FOR ANTITRUST PROSECUTIONS.

The Democratic Party, in its platform adopted at Baltimore, announced to the country that it favored the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as civil law against trusts and trust officials. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is full of demands by Members on the Democratic side of the House during this session for the enforcement of the antitrust laws. The truth is that during this administration, and especially during this year, greater progress has been successfully made in the enforcement of the laws upon the statute books against trusts than since the enactment of the antitrust law in 1890. The last report of the Attorney General shows that during the fiscal year 1911 there was collected and paid into the Treasury in fines around $4,204,115.51, which is $980,341.62 more than was expended for that year for the Department of Justice and all the special attorneys employed in the various prosecutions. The estimate submitted by the Attorney General for the enforcement of these laws for this fiscal year was $300,000; the amount appropriated was $200,000. Professions are one thing; action is another thing.

In the appropriations for the enforcement of the commerce acts the necessary amount was decreased from $25,000 to $10,000.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY.

The Howard University, at Washington, is the only university supported in part by the Federal Treasury for the training of the colored race. It has done and is doing splendid work in educating and training practical young men and women who go out after their training for the instruction of those of their race. A new dormitory was shown to be, in my judgment, necessary and various improvements requiring Federal appropriations, and they were not made.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

St. Elizabeth, the insane hospital, not only for the people of the District of Columbia but for the soldiers and sailors and veterans of the War of the Rebellion who are cared for in that great institution, needs appropriations for extension and for the security of patients there, and they were also withheld.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

The Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service estimated $500,000 for the prevention of epidemics, and in view of our extended coast lines, the bubonic plague, the yellow fever, and other dangerous diseases, this amount should have been granted. The appropriation made was for $200,000 and every effort to increase the same was successfully combated by a Democratic House.

IMMIGRATION SERVICE.

Almost a million of immigrants come to this country annually, very largely from Europe. Necessary funds, especially for the immigration station at New York, were denied. This service is of vast importance for the security of the people of the United States and for the efficient enforcement of the law, and this, too, although the head tax that is collected from immigrants coming to the United States far exceeded the expenditures necessary for the service.

DEMOCRATIC FAILURE.

Time does not allow the further specifying of the failure of the Democratic House to appropriate properly for the public service, of which there are many scores of other instances that might properly be made, nor does the condition of the United States warrant the withholding of necessary appropriations. Under Republican revenue laws enacted by Republican Congresses the surplus revenues after the payment of all expenditures for the last fiscal year were $37,224,501.90, and the receipts so far this fiscal year justify me in predicting a surplus of $50,000,000 for the coming fiscal year. I make this prediction absolutely sure of fulfillment if the present production and prosperity of the country continues until the 1st day of July, 1913.

Mr. Speaker, verily, verily, say I unto you, the Democratic Party whenever given partial or complete power have heretofore and continue to thunder in the index and do not perform in the text.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour fixed in the concurrent resolution for final adjournment is about to arrive. The Speaker desires to congratulate the membership of the House on having reached the end of one of the longest and most laborious sessions in the history of Congress. There are a few sessions which have exceeded this in length, counting from the first Monday in December until the close, but I believe that a careful examination of the RECORD would show that Congress has been actually in session more days since the first Monday in December than any other Congress that ever sat. [Applause.]

The Speaker desires to thank all the Members of the House, on both sides of the big aisle, which, when he was sworn in to the office of Speaker, he said separates us politically but not as friends or patriots, for the uniform courtesy with which they have treated the Speaker. If the administration of that great office in the present Speaker's hands has been successful, it is largely due to the assistance he has received from the Members of this House.

I hope that we shall all reach home safely and find our loved ones well; that we shall all have an enjoyable vacation and return on the first Monday of next December refreshed and invigorated for the work that will lie before us. [Applause.]

And now, in accordance with the provisions of the concurrent resolution, I declare the second session of the Sixty-second Congress adjourned without day.
